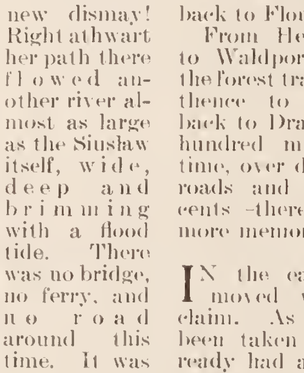
It would require many words even to begin to estimate the value of this good man's work to the life of America and of the world. The combined circulation of Dr. Strong's books in English has been 326,000 copies, and they are still selling. Several have been published in European and Asiatic languages; "Our Country" in German and Dutch, and a large portion of "The New Era" in Chinese. Permission has also been given to publish it in French. "The New Era," "The Times and Young Men" and "The Next Great Awakening" have been translated into Japanese. Permission has been given to translate "The Times and Young Men" into German, and "The Challenge of the City" into Portuguese. "Religious Movements for Social Betterment" has been translated into French. What the circulation of these books in other languages has been cannot be ascertained.

Mr. Spofford, former Librarian-in-chief of Congress, called "Our-Country" "one of the best books in the world." A Methodist preacher said to his congregation, "if you can own only three books, let them be the Bible, the Methodist Hymn Book, and 'Our Country.'" Rev. Dr. William Irwin, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, has said that a very wealthy Presbyterian, who was never known to give anything, was about sailing for Europe soon after the book appeared. Dr. Irwin presented him with a copy of "Our Country." He was gone some weeks, and immediately on his return sent a check for $10,000 to the as- ury of the society. Dr. vin added, "I have no doubt at it has put a million d ars into Christian work." ny different denominations ve used the book in their me missionary work, and several ve published the last chapter for s ial distribution.



Dr. Josiah Strong

Dr. Strong's books have been sed as textbooks in a number of co ges and seminaries, also by Bible cl es. Some prayer meetings have used "The New Era," a chapter for a me ng. The book has also been used as ily readings at family worship. "The Challenge of the City" has been ed by a large number of classes.

Dr. Strong was born of New En nd parentage at Naperville, Ill., ear Chicago, January 19, 1847. ile yet a child his parents remove to Hudson, Ohio, the seat of We rn Reserve College, where he was g u- ated in 1869. He studied at ne Theological Seminary until 1871, nd

In the Footsteps of Livingstone

By Rev. John M. Springer, Superintendent Congo Mission of the M. E. Church

Native pastor and wife

MORE than twoscore years ago a group of natives might have been seen one day wading the swamps of Cen-ti Africa. Two of them bore on their sl ilders a long, stout bamboo polo o which was tied an old blanket to fc a rude hammock. In this lay a ek white man, who was making his la journey in the African wilds.

'eaching Chitambo's village, they a d for shelter from the sun, while tl built a grass hut, into which they te lerly carried the sick man, and pl ed him on the low, rude bed. He w too ill to be conscious all the time, b in his moments of coming back, as it w , to the world, he realized that he h probably taken his last day's trek in he continent to which he had given hi ife. For he was a physician as well as an explorer and missionary, and k w his own symptoms well.

'hat night the village drum was silent, a the swarthy denizens of the great fo st talked in subdued tones as they g hered around the campfire and lis-te d to the story that the strangers h to tell about their master, who was s ll in yonder hut. As they talked, tl e flickered through the sick man's h l a realization that his feet would n r tread those hills of green copper m chite toward which he was heading, n would he ever discover the sources o he Nile and Congo Rivers, which h been his hope for many years. B somehow in that hour it did not m ter that these lesser successes had n been achieved. "The end of the g graphical feat is the beginning of the m ionary enterprise," echoed and re-e ed through his weary brain. How di rent things look in the dawning of et nity!

was some time during the night tl there came to him the splendid vi on of "the chariots of Israel and th horsemen thereof." The indomi-ta e spirit, with one final effort, gathered all its remaining strength, and, lifting his worn body from the bed, he fell on his knees, bowed his face in his hands, made one last great cry for the healing of "the open sore of the world," and Africa's greatest missionary, David Livingstone, passed from earth.

Today there is an output of more than 1,500 tons of copper per month from those very copper mines within 150 miles of the spot where Livingstone's heart was buried by faithful Chuma and Susi, ere they made that heroic trip to the coast with the poor worn-out body. Near that spot there is now a memorial mission station founded by Livingstone's nephew, Rev. Malcolm M. Moffat, who has been recently joined by two of Livingstone's grandchildren, Hubert Livingstone Wilson, M.D., and his sister Ruth, who is a trained nurse.

THE first man to be guided by Livingstone's writings to these malachite hills was Frederick Arnot, who had played with Livingstone's children when a youth. As he heard Livingstone's letters read, his soul was filled with a deathless passion to take the Gospel to that same country for which Livingstone died. When he did go he found very few natives living on the copper hills; but fifty miles to the northeast was the great Msidi's town, and so he went thither and established the Garanganze Mission of the Plymouth Brethren, which has had a marked success.

Then another young Scotch lad read David Livingstone's books and his imagination was fired to reach those copper mines and develop that copper country. He saw in those great malachite hills the key for the opening up of Central Africa to commerce and for the abolition of the slave trade. Robert Williams was a mining engineer and a born promoter. So he interested men to form a great company to explore and develop that region, and Mr. George Grey, brother of Sir Edward Grey, found the first of all these rich ore deposits. That was less than two decades ago. Five years ago the Cape-to-Cairo Railway, advanced by the tireless efforts of Mr. Williams, crossed the Belgian Border, near which was the first mine of that extensive copper belt. Since then one has been able to travel, in a week's time, the 2,600 miles from Cape Town into the great green heart of the Congo in a comfortable railway coach, ith dining-car attached.

In 1911 Elizabethville, the capital of that section of the Congo known as the Katanga, sprang up like a mushroom in a night. Prospectors, traders and government officials by hundreds poured into it, and also thousands of natives; but to this day there has been no Protestant missionary in this miniature city, with its wide streets, electric lights, saloons, hotels, cinematographs, large stores and immense smelting plant. Hundreds of Christian natives from the missions of Nyasaland came to Elizabethville to work, and have continually besought the missionaries to shepherd them, to help them toward reaching the tens of thousands of raw natives who are recruited to do unskilled labor, and who have never seen a missionary.

MRS. SPRINGER and I first visited these mines in 1907 on our way across to the west coast. We returned in 1913, coming this time from the west after three years of exploring the forests of the untouched Lunda country, reducing the language to writing, and preparing the way for a permanent work. We had finally sent our lay worker, Mr. Herman Heinkel, who was associated with us during those three years, to the capital of Mwata Yamvo to build a house for Dr. and Mrs. Piper, who were under appointment, while we came east to the railroad. What did we find? As the rails advanced and the road was finally laid into Kambove, on June 6, 1913, they were preceded by an array of saloons and vile resorts. There was not a decent place where either natives or white men could congregate. There was not a book to be bought. The very first day we landed, a native ran out into the street and hailed me and asked if I would order a Sankey hymn-book for him. White men hailed me and begged for reading matter, and when a lot of Christian Heralds arrived they were seized with avidity and gratitude.

We had a book store in full swing before ever we had a roof over our heads. The natives who could read ordered Bibles and hymn-books, and those who could not read besought us for primers in their various languages. With what little money we had we planted the Fox Bible Training School on land adjoining the railroad, and started our evangelists and senior boys teaching and preaching in as many of the compounds as possible, sending colporteurs up and down the railroad line with books and literature for sale.

The next year Dr. and Mrs. Piper went to Mwata Yamvo's capital, four hundred miles away, and later Rev. and Mrs. Guptill came to help us at Kambove, not to mention Mrs. Springer's mother, Mrs. Miller, who came out as a voluntary missionary in 1914. Then she returned to America with us, and the whole work of that copper section fell on the Guptills' young shoulders.

So there you are! Fields are white unto the harvest in the seven mining centers, with their hundreds of white men and thousands of natives. Every mail brings letters from the Christian natives, telling how they are praying for more missionaries. From many centers the raw heathen are begging us to send them native teachers so that they may "learn," as they say. There is the printing-press already turning out Scripture verses weekly, but needing a printer to give all his time to turning out primers, hymn-books, and other literature. There is the Bible Training School, with over thirty young men and boys in training as future workers, and at the present time there is only that one missionary couple to oversee it all. The primary need is for an additional missionary couple. An acceptable man and wife are ready to go in a short time and on short notice. To send them we must cover their support, including, besides transportation, their outfit, incidental expenses, and a moderate yearly budget. We have also thirty young men in the Fox Bible Training School preparing for Christian work, and we need scholarships for them at $25 a year. We need the support of ten native preachers at $60 a year.

On this mineral field there are seven settlements of Europeans, and our Methodist Episcopal Church is doing an interdenominational work, but especially amongst the blacks. Help us to do it well!

Among the Workers

THE horror of war and the triumph of faith are both illustrated in a letter recently received by the Christian Heral rom Joseph Morris of Brighton, E and. Mr. Morris says: "Mrs. M ris had just concluded a twelve da mission for young women at th Young Women's Christian Association at B on-on-Trent, and was in the very act of gi g her final address, and with her Bible in he and was making a most passionate appeal to e undecided to accept the Lord Jesus C st as their own personal Saviour, when a bo struck her, and she was instantly trans-la to glory; and with her four of the new co erts ascended in the same chariot of fire."

MR. E. TENNYSON SMITH, of England, well known as a temperance advocate an prohibition campaigner, is in America con-du ng a temperance campaign. The message of e speaker has aroused every audience wl h he has addressed, and a surprising num-be f persons have publicly signed the pledge at e close of the meetings. On his previous vi to this country Mr. Tennyson Smith con-du d campaigns in many cities and towns to as the fight for "no license," and an official cir lar issued by the organization which invited him to America states that in almost every case where his services were secured the city voted "no license."

Mr. Smith has had a wide experience in fights for prohibition, having made extensive tours in Canada, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, and the press in New Zealand states that some of the most important and permanent victories for prohibition in that country were the outcome of his two and a half years' campaign there. During his previous campaign in America he became familiar with the temperance and prohibition problem in this country, and has a thorough grasp of the situation.

EVANGELIST CHARLES R. SCOVILLE has closed a notable revival at Keokuk, Iowa, at which many attended from Hamilton, Warsaw, Nauvoo, Summitville Fort Madison and other neighboring towns. Great audiences packed the big tabernacle, and it is estimated that the total attendance was over 200,000. Over 3,500 "hit the trail" during the campaign, the converts on the closing day being 173. Forty men and women offered themselves for the ministry or missionary work.

SOME years ago Valentine A. Schreiber, nineteen years old, left the little town in Ohio in which he was born and drifted to East Liverpool, where he found open saloons, unrestricted gambling, and every opportunity for evil, and made good use of his oportunities. In 1907, during a series of revival meetings, his wife was converted and finally prevailed upon him to attend the meetings, which he did; finally deciding to yield his life to God. He had had only the most meager common school education, but after he was converted he made up by reading what he had lacked in schooling. He went into politics and was elected mayor of East Liverpool on a temperance ticket, becoming mayor January 1, 1914 He proceeded at once to enforce vigorously the liquor laws and the laws against gambling, and to take an active part in the state-wide campaign for prohibition. At the expiration of his term of office as mayor of East Liverpool Mr. Schreiber became associated in evangelistic work with Rev. J. B. McMinn, of Wheaton, Ill., where his ability to organize men will be put to good use in the directing of the evangelistic campaigns.

ONE of the most striking features in mission work is the holding of Regional Conferences in the important centers of Latin-America, to carry direct to them the message of the Panama Congress. Immediately following the congress, deputations left Panama to hold such conferences in Lima, Santiago, Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro, Barranquilla, Havana and San Juan. These conferences endeavor to put into practice on particular fields the results of the general discussions at Panama. The most significant movement was the formation of the "Evangelical Union of Porto Rico," in which practically all the denominations of the island unite. They will hereafter be known as churches of the Evangelical Union.

Germany's Reply

AT last the long tension is over. Germany's note in reply to ours of April 20 dealing with the conduct of her submarine warfare was received in Washington in the forenoon of May 5. Summarized, it is substantially as follows:

The German government declines to accept as final the proof offered by the American government that the steamer Sussex was destroyed by a German torpedo. It declares that no assurances have ever been given to the United States that the restrictions of international law, as to visit and search and the destruction of merchant vessels, would be recognized in the conduct of submarine warfare against enemy trade carried on enemy freight ships encountered in the war zone about Great Britain. The German government insists that its submarine commanders were ordered to recognize these restrictions in all other cases, and "cannot admit any doubt that these orders were given or are executed in good faith." The government acknowledges, however, that errors have occurred. The German government puts the blame for the greater part of the accidents to American citizens upon the American government itself as the result of that government's refusal to carry out the suggestions made by the German government for reducing to a minimum dangers to American travelers and American goods.

The German government is willing, however, to make further concession in adapting methods of submarine war to the interests of neutrals. It protests that it was forced to the "hard but effective weapon of submarine warfare . . . in self-defense against the illegal conduct of British warfare." The German government regrets that "the sentiments of humanity, which the government of the United States extends with such fervor to the unhappy victims of submarine warfare, are not extended with the same warmth of feeling to many millions of women and children, who, according to the avowed intentions of the British government, shall be starved, and who, by sufferings, shall force the victorious armies of the Central Powers into ignominious capitulation."

The German government states, however, that it cannot be expected now to restrict the use of an effective weapon if its enemy is permitted to violate rules of international law. It "is convinced that the government of the United States does not think of making such a demand, knowing that it has determined to restore the principle of the freedom of the seas from whatever quarter it has been violated."

While the German note is of a character to relieve the present situation and to give assurance of no immediate danger of a break it places upon our government the responsibility for carrying out to a conclusion the work that is necessary to a complete understanding with all the powers, on international law in relation to sea-going warfare. In agreeing to eliminate from her undersea campaign those features to which we made objection, Germany now demands that, as a measure of equal impartiality to all combatants, we should call upon Great Britain to raise the blockade of Germany, which was the original cause of the submarine warfare of which we complain. Failing this, the Berlin government reserves to itself the right to cancel all concessions and revoke all promises. Not Germany but England, the note reminds us, was the first aggressor to violate the rules of international law, and she must bear the responsibility for much of the injury and suffering that resulted to neutrals and noncombatants.

Regarded as a whole, the note may be interpreted as conceding all the essential demands of the American note, and thus paving the way to a clearer understanding between the two governments. It disposes of any danger of a break at this time. It is an enlightening note, too, in other respects. Germany's assertion of her regard for the rights of humanity and her emphatic repudiation of any deliberate disregard of these rights in the present war are entitled to full consideration. At the same time the note admits that in such a struggle there is a possibility of errors in sea and land warfare which are by no means confined to any one participant power.

Toward Christian Unity

MAY is a month of important matters with a number of leading denominations. The Methodists are in session for the entire month at Saratoga; the Presbyterian Assembly is meeting at Atlantic City, and the Northern Baptist Convention at Minneapolis. Special interest among the Presbyterians centers in the unprecedented proposition to expel an entire presbytery, the presbytery of New York, from the denomination.

Of chief interest to the Methodists is the progress being made in the movement to unite the various separated bodies of Methodism. The most definite step so far made toward unity was taken the other day, when the General Conference voted, by recommendation of the Bishops, to elect a committee which shall have the right to negotiate the terms of organic unity. There is large hope that the long existing breach between the Northern and Southern bodies of Methodism will at length be bridged.

Another interesting proposition before the Methodists is that of admitting laymen to the annual conferences. If this measure passes it will prove to be one of the most striking developments in the movement to give laymen a commanding position in the organic affairs of the church.

With plans now under way for a World Conference on Faith and Order and the development of the World Alliance of the Churches for the Promotion of International Friendship, there is reason to expect some real progress in Christian unity during the years just ahead. There is little likelihood that the endeavor to separate the New York Presbytery from the jurisdiction of the General Assembly will be pushed to a consummation. Some method will be found by which these brethern can still dwell together in unity. All signs point away from the paths of separation, toward a new spirit of unity among the various members of the body of Christ.

A Shattered Dream

BORN of enthusiasm and proclaimed with the confidence that comes of death-defying courage, the little drama of the Irish republican movement has come to a sudden close. It could hardly have been otherwise. From the beginning it seems to have been an imperfectly organized movement, with the forces widely scattered and only partially armed. Five days after being chosen "provisional president," Patrick Pearse, the leader of the rebellion, together with two of his associates, was captured, tried by summary court-martial, convicted and shot. Several thousands of his followers have surrendered. A few of the more prominent may meet the fate of Pearse, but the majority will doubtless be sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. How to deal with the women prisoners, many of whom fought alongside their husbands and brothers, is a perplexing problem.

In view of the splendid services rendered to the Allies by the loyal Irish forces in the European field, and of the hopelessness of the home rebellion from the very beginning, it will occur to most thoughtful Americans that the British government might easily have adopted a more generous policy in dealing with the conquered insurgents. In the resignation of Secretary Birrell from the cabinet, one may gather that he, at least, did not approve of the extraordinary and almost ferocious severity of the fate dealt out to the misguided Irish leaders. The rebellion in a very marked degree was one of the youth of the country—a movement of young men and women, who had cherished the hope that the great opportunity had come for national independence. And now the collapse is complete, the dream is over. How unexpected was the sudden failure may be gathered from the fact that on the very day of the crisis, when the break-up had already begun, some of the more sanguine revolutionists cabled to New York announcing the triumph of the revolution. As matters now stand, Home Rule may be regarded as postponed indefinitely. Great Britain's grasp on Ireland will doubtless be stronger and heavier than before, nor will it soon be relaxed. War is war, as the Nationalists have learned to their sorrow. If they had hoped for leniency, in view of the sacrifices their brothers are making in Europe, they now see that that hope was unfounded. And the little rebellion will pass into history as a tragic episode of the great war, while the names of those who fell and those who suffered after the surrender will be added to the long list of martyrs who have given their lives in the cause of Irish independence.

Our Big Bible Class

ARE you joining that big new Christian Herald Bible Class whose members are poring over their Bibles trying to find the passages that fit the series of pictures just published? There is still plenty of time to come in. Answers will be received any time up to July 17.

The spirit of many in this picture contest is revealed in the earnest letters we have been receiving telling of new joy and blessing in this renewed searching among the treasures of the old Book. One w man writes: "To me participation in this contest ha een like entering an attractive house, interested its external appearance, and finding there a true me, soul-satisfying, restful, a goal of all desires. I ave long since forgotten the things that led to enter; I am remaining to win the rewards the Spirit."

More and more people in every station of li are writing us that the Contest is interesting them b ond measure in many an evening of quiet, absorbed joyment; that every member of the family is taki an active part in finding verses to suit the pictures. We wish indeed we had the space to tell you what artfelt thanks have been extended to us by mothers ose sons and daughters find a new home interest the Contest. Invalids have written of the good th ontest is doing them— good measured in actual be red health, in restored tranquillity, and in a swee ned outlook upon life. Many, many letters are c ing from those who have never before been reached the external Word, but whose interest has first bee von by the Contest, growing finally to a realization t life is fuller and complete for them at last.

Above all, every one says: "If the rewards me, that will indeed be an acceptable return; b the pleasure of conning over the beloved verses, the terest of reviewing the pictures, portraying as they the scenes and truths we learn of anew, is the g ler reward, and one which will be more than suf ent in itself."

To Keep the Philippines

IT was a wise and honorable decision tha was reached in the House of Representatives on lay 1, when the Clarke amendment to the Phil ine Bill, granting the independence of the islands hin four years, was rejected by a vote of 213 t 65. This bill, which was regarded as an Administ ion measure, has been very widely discussed sin its passage in the Senate. The sentiment of the co try has been emphatically expressed in condemnat of a policy which, to very many minds, involve the repudiation of a solemn pledge given shortly ter our occupation of the islands began. That dge was to the effect that the Filipinos should be gr ted independence only when they were fully qualifi for self-government and the duties of citizenship. uring all those years since then, we have been w ing on the lines of that pledge. But while exc ent progress has been made, it is well known to all w are familiar with the situation that the island popu ion is still far from the goal. To assume that a po in civilization had been reached at which we wou be justified in turning over the archipelago to it wn native government would be a pitiful distorti of the actual facts of the case. Besides, in the p ent strained condition of our international relation our relinquishment of the Philippines could have no her aspect than that of "scuttling," to relieve our ves of a difficult situation. The House of Repres tatives, however, took the view that the nation ust redeem its pledge, and that the plan to gran the Filipinos independence within four years, or hin any fixed date, was impracticable and should n he adopted.

It would have been a great blunder on the p of the Administration, particularly at the present ne, had it succeeded in driving through the indepen nce bill. Fuller knowledge of the situation in ese islands shows that the Filipinos have only start on the road to a real nationality and a decent ci zation. It would have been a grave reproach upo the good faith and honor of the nation to have des ted them at a time when it would have been impo ble to convey to the rest of the world any impression ian that of a very decided step backward in ou nat nal dignity and good faith. It would have left the is ds an open prey to the menace of invasion by Jap or any other hostile power. It would have been a het unworthy of us as a civilized Christian nation, c ming the honor and respect of other governments nd peoples.

Note on Our Easter Pictures

SEVERAL of the reproductions of great pictures in our ue of April 19 were from prints by the Berlin Photog hi Company, and among these, the second picture on pa 494 by Eichstadt depicting the supper at Emmaus should ave borne the imprint "Copyright by Photographische ellschaft. By permission of the Berlin Photographic Co. ew York," as did the two pictures on page 492. In additi to making this correction, which is due to the publishers of ose prints, we are also glad to mention that the picture "Ch in Gethsemane" and "The Last Supper" are also from nts by the Berlin Photographic Company.

The New San Francisco

SAN FRANCISCO recently commemorated the tenth anniversary of the great earthquake which destroyed one and a half thousa lives and a half billion dollars. At he time of the disaster it looked as th gh the damage could never be re red. But at the end of ten years the stood a bigger, better and more be tiful city at the Golden Gate. Th shock and fires waked the city up to e greater magnitudes required of it the main seaport of the we ern coast. Only nine ye after San Francisco was sh en into a heap of ruins, it ha arisen out of its ashes to sta the World's Fair, ackn ledged to have been one of he greatest expositions ev held. If disaster challen s enterprise, and the ashes of in become the foundation of velier architecture and m massive masonry; if out of an's misfortune his greatest ortune comes, what mirael of reconstruction and recu ation will follow the wi d wreckage made by the wa n Europe! Science, which ha devoted its attention to th manufacture of instrume s of destruction, will turn to ose of construction; greater ies will spring up out of th shes of the burned ones; m bountiful harvests will wh n the fields plowed by war an soaked with blood; more ma ificent temples of freedo will arise; more comely ins tutions of beneficence wil ppear; a sorely afflicted ch h will become more perfec hrough suffering, the indiv ual heart will become mo holy through tears; horrid eath will be an evangel to ake the nations up to a ore magnificent life, a sw er love, and an immortal des y. The destruction of the nillions of precious lives, the crime of the centuries, ma have been allowed by the Great Ruler that out of th shes of the dead there mi t come the inspiration for a new and greater Eu pe, which will tread the pat of righteousness and pr ess more firmly, represent th irit of his Son more comple y, and usher in his kin lom more rapidly. The ill ration of the great truth of ht out of darkness, joy out of suffer g, life out of death, is thus referred to: For it became him, for whom are all thi s, in bringing many sons unto glory, to ke the Captain of their salvation per t through sufferings." (Heb. 2: 10.)

Governor in Prison

E. L. PHILLIPS, millionaire governor of Wisconsin, recently spent two day in the Wisconsin State Prison. So body told him that his state prison wa s bad as Sing Sing. Hearing this he anged wardens, ordered stricter disc line, and then went to jail himself study at close range the real condit s there. His jail experience will fur h the basis of a system of prison ref n. His common sense and loyalty in e matter are to be commended. A g ater than the governor of a state, the overnor of the Universe, himself ca down from heaven to the prison hou of earth, not to go through the for of suffering and disgrace to improve the ondition of the condemned, but actually endured unutterable anguish and shame, that the myriads of imprisoned souls might not only have comfort, but that they might have pardon for their offenses and be sent out with hearts pure, lives changed, souls saved, to enter the boundless ranges of liberty, service, and love. How accurately the prophet described him on the mission: "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." (Isa. 53: 5.)

Students Expelled for Hazing

TWELVE students were recently expelled from a university in Louisiana for hazing. This brutal habit, which used to be so general in the colleges, has been nearly eliminated from the educational institutions of the country. The perils and fatalities of clean athletics are enough without resorting to the coarse, brutal, dangerous habit of hazing. This form of rowdyism had such a hold that the United States government had a hard time to drive it out of West Point and Annapolis. The laws of most universities and colleges forbid hazing, and if the students see fit to break that law, to indulge in such coarse, unbecoming conduct, they have no one but themselves to blame if they are expelled for insubordination. Fun is fun; but there is no fun to the poor fellow getting hazed and none but that of a ruffian to the ones administering the punishment. Those breaking the rules of good breeding and the laws of the college by the brutal sport also break the golden rule: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." (Matt. 7: 12.)

Shark Meat for Food

THE Federal Bureau of Fisheries at Washington is paying special attention to shark meat as an article of food. Many trap fishermen of Massachusetts and other coasts send all of the sharks except one species to the markets of Boston and New York and sell them as deep-sea sword-fish, which, when the head, tail and fins are cut off, they much resemble. They bring from three to eight cents a pound wholesale. The fishermen of Long Island and other waters, who used to throw away their dogfish, which is of the shark family, as worthless, now save them, and send them to market in the cities. The sentimental thought of eating a man-eating shark is not very inviting, but as the law does not prevent it, its use as an article of diet is a question of taste. It should not be allowed to be sold as another kind of fish. The statutes are justly growing more strict as to pure food and honest labeling. There have been fishes answering to our sharks in all seas in all times. The fishing industry was important in olden times. There is this record of fish merchants who violated the Sabbath law: "There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the Sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem." (Neh. 13: 16.)

Bible Escapes Torpedo Wreck

An American mail-order house received an order for a family Bible from a customer in far distant Sierra Leone West Africa. Packed, weighing eleven pounds, it was shipped to Liverpool, England, to be sent from there by British post to its destination. Tucked away in a stout mail sack it was placed on the ill-fated Falaba, which was sent to the bottom within a few miles of the English coast. The fatal torpedo that sank the vessel tore the mail-bag open and threw the Bible free from the swirl of wreckage in which the ship went down and the book floated to the shore. It was picked up on the beach by a Scotchman, who, noticing the mark on the package, returned it to the Liverpool agent, who, after notifying the firm, sent it back to the mail-order house, which placed it as a prized relic in its headquarters. Though water-soaked the words are legible. A second Bible was started to Mr. J. Terry Morgan, the customer in Sierra Leone. Soon afterward a letter was received from Mr. Morgan asking why his Bible had not been sent, and saying that he was anxious to receive it. It did not reach him in time, for the angel of death was swifter than the railroad or steamship. He died in the faith of the Christ whom the Book for which he had sent was written to reveal, and went to the heaven it so surely described. In all the conflicts, wars and convulsions of society, the Bible has always emerged from the wreckage unharmed to be the life and light of the world. There is no knife sharp enough, no bullet swift enough, no bomb terrific enough to shatter it. After comparing man's earthly frailty to grass, the apostle thus contrasts the immortality of God's revealed truth: "But the word of the Lord endureth forever. And this is the word which by the Gospel is preached unto you." (I Peter 1: 25)

Fortune for Factory Girl

A YOUNG woman of Seaford, Del., has just been informed that she has fallen heir to the estate of her uncle, who died a few days ago. Her uncle, who was a lumber merchant in Portland, made a visit to his home town of Seaford and, delighted with his niece, tried to persuade her to go out and live with him. She told him she would do so this summer, and intended to keep her promise, when she received a letter from him on his deathbed saying he had willed his entire estate, worth $40,000, to her. His watches, diamond stickpin, rings, and jewels said to be worth $4,000, came with the letter to her. This heiress is an honest, industrious young girl, earning five dollars a week in a shirt factory in Seaford. She has good sense and fine principles, and is likely to make good use of the fortune left in her hands. As children of God and through our blood kinship with Jesus Christ, our Elder Brother, we are made heirs to an inheritance whose value cannot be weighed in earthly scales, nor counted by human fingers. It is thus referred to by the apostle: "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." (Rom. 8:17.)

Hugo the Giant Dead

HUGO, a circus giant, who was said to be the tallest man in the world, died in New York, April 23, from pneumonia. He was eight feet four inches high, and weighed 536 pounds. He was born in Italy forty-seven years ago. Bodily size has little to do with real manhood or womanhood. There are physical giants that are mental and moral pygmies, and there are tiny men and women who have shaken the world with their ability and influence. The body is the residence of the soul, and as such is the temple of God. The apostle so describes it: "What? Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God?" (I Cor. 6 : 19.)

American Exploration

THE American Museum of Natural History, which has been conducting a series of expeditions among the pueblos and ruins of the Southwest, has arranged to send six expeditions into the field. These explorations are to be financed by Mr. Arthur M. Huntington. Nels C. Nelson is just starting as leader of an expedition which will be divided into three exploration parties, organized for research work in New Mexico and Arizona. Five years will be required to develop the work of exploration. Professor A. L. Kroeber, of the University of California, will study the Zuñi pueblos, and Dr. Robert H. Lowie the Hopi pueblos near the Grand Canyon of Arizona. The explorers may find some human bones, but not a living person, in the ruins. Aside from the scientific lessons the explorations will teach will be the solemn religious truth that all our earthly activities must cease as the tomb is entered. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest." (Eccles. 9: 10.)

Uncle Sam's Railroad Rival

CONTINUING FRANK G. CARPENTER'S ALASKA STORY

(Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter)

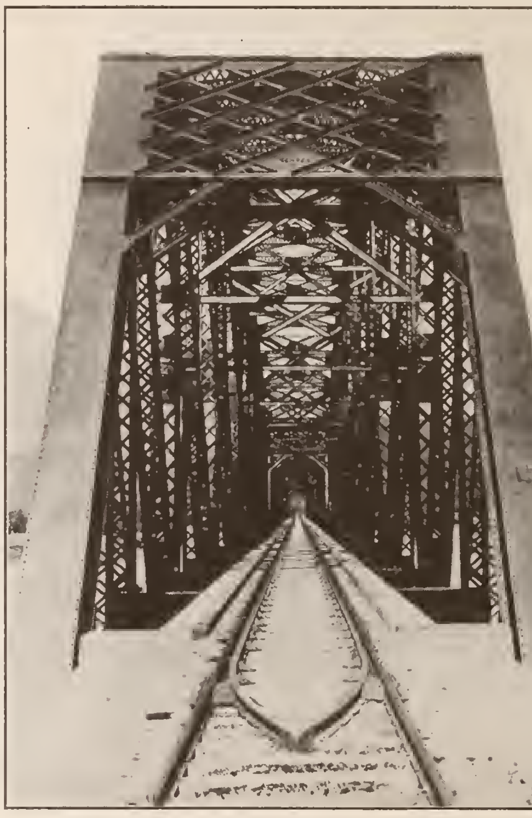
I HAVE crossed Prince William Sound from Seward to Cordova. Seward is the terminus of Uncle Sam's railway to Fairbanks and Cordova is the terminus of the Copper River Railway, which was built by the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate to open up their great copper mines, which are at Kennecott, about 200 miles in the interior. The two ports lie almost opposite each other at the western and eastern ends of the great bay known as Prince William Sound. Their distance apart is the width of the bay, which is 200 miles. Both ports have excellent harbors free from ice all the year round. Both are close to valuable coal fields, and each forms a natural gateway for a railroad to the interior of the territory.

The railroad commission appointed by President Taft to plan out the best lines of transportation for the development of Alaska, chose Cordova and the Copper River road for extension to Fairbanks in preference to Seward and the Alaska Northern, but it advised that a second road be built from Seward around Cook Inlet and across to the Yukon by way of the Iditarod gold region. It also proposed a branch line to the Matanuska coal fields. The present administration has decided that the Seward-Fairbanks line is the better, and the road along that route is now being built. It is not improbable that the Copper River road may be extended at some time in the future.

During my stay in Cordova I have taken a trip over this railroad. Its technical name is the Copper River and Northwestern Railway. The cars go smoothly. The passenger coaches are like those of the States. Their finish is oak and the seats are upholstered in wicker. The road is well built and well ballasted. It has the standard gauge track, with seventy-pound rails similar to those on the new government railway. The road crosses the mountains by easy grades, and it is so made that a train load of about 700 tons can be carried each way over it. The construction of the road began in 1906, and was completed in 1911. Its cost, it is said, is somewhere between fifteen and twenty million dollars, and some of its building shows great skill and scientific engineering. There are 196 miles of road now in operation, and upon this there are daily freight trains on the Kennecott branch, and three trains a week between Cordova and Chitina, the station from where it was proposed to extend the road on to Fairbanks.

The company has office buildings and machine and car shops here at Cordova. It has also built a large ocean wharf accessible to steamers at all stages of the tide. The cars bring their freight right to the steamers and are unloaded with the minimum of handling. There are ample warehouses and facilities for furnishing the steamers with fresh water and fuel oil. There is an automobile service between the wharf and the town, which is about three-quarters of a mile away. As soon as our ship came to anchor the hatches were raised and we began to load copper ore. The ore cars were automatically dumped and the bags of copper, each holding about a half-bushel, were shot from the cars right into the hold of the steamer. The loading went on for almost a day, and during that time we took in a cargo valued at about $800,000.

The route taps the Wrangell range, the richest known mineral section of Alaska. This range has gold, copper and silver. It has the richest copper mines of the world, and some which are now producing 60,000,000 pounds of copper a year at a cost of less than 5 cents a pound. The road is now bringing down from the Kennecott mines 200 carloads of such ore per month, and its yearly revenue from that source is something like $2,000,000. The ore is charged freight according to its value, and that now coming down averages over 70 per cent. pure copper and pays at the rate of a thousand dollars a carload. Some of the lower grade ores pay only $7 or $8 a ton.



Miles Glacier Bridge; in the glacial garden. It cost $1,500,000

Another argument made for the Copper River Railroad was its accessibility to the Bering River coal field, which is only thirty-two miles from the present tracks and about seventy-five miles from Cordova. This is the coal that was so widely discussed when Mr. Gifford Pinchot and others made their great campaign for conservation. It is of excellent character and it could be brought here to Cordova for smelting and reducing the ores. There are at present being mined about Prince William Sound and in the mountains nearby ores amounting to 50,000 tons per month. Much of this goes over the railway to Cordova, and it all has to be transported from here to the smelters at Tacoma, 1,200 miles away. With smelters at Cordova, the cost of reduction would be greatly decreased and new mineral regions could be opened up. At the same time, the coal from the Bering River field would have a local market, and both the coal and the ore would furnish a steady and valuable traffic to the railway.

THE Copper River and Northwestern Railway is one of the picturesque routes of the world. It is the only railroad that carries you right to the foot of magnificent glaciers and allows you to examine these greatest wonders of nature while the train stops. Within an hour of our arrival at Cordova an excursion train started out from the wharf, and the tourists on board were carried a distance of about fifty miles up the Copper River Valley to the Miles and Childs Glaciers, two mighty rivers of ice that stand almost facing each other on opposite sides of the track.

Leaving Cordova the road winds around the hills high over the ater. It hangs to rocky cliffs, which a covered with a dense vegetation. little later it enters the mouth of the pper River Valley and skirts Eyak ake, which fills a depression scooped t by some prehistoric glacier. The ke is star-shaped and is almost entire shut in by high wooded mountains, hich rise abruptly from the water's edge. The road goes for four miles al the winding shores of this lake, an then crosses the Eyak River, which rries the glacial waters of the l e out to the sea. It is by th river that the boats from Cor a go into and out from the la and during the summer mo s the stream is gay with cano rowboats and power craft o very description. The lake eems with fish and it has e llent trout. During the wint it is sometimes frozen over, d is then used for skatin and sleighing. There is some hing done at that time throug holes in the ice.

Leaving the lake we ssed through a dense forest of ruce, some of the trees of whic were two feet in diameter. W then wound our way over the pper River Delta, crossing eam after stream, which com from the great glaciers of the i rior. The flats extend for a d ance of sixteen miles east and st, a wide expanse of green lev and, half swamps, with wat here and there showing out the green. There are duel and geese on the ponds. T fly up and away as the train mes. We could often see w s of green ice from the train. The glaciers reached the clou that dark, rainy day. There as a dense forest between and them. The ice seemed be looking at us over the tre

We rode by several fox rms. composed of cages o wire netting, with red and blac oxes within; and farther on one side we saw the graves some miners who tried in vain to get t ough by this way to the Klondike in t gold rush of 1898.

Some parts of the flats are floo d by the ocean at high tide. There ar any bridges. At Mile 16 the bridg seem to go from island to island. are crossing the mouths of the strea As we left Round Island we passed t ough snowsheds on the flats. It is an isual thing to build snowsheds on th evel. A little farther on we crossed Long Island, and at Mile 34 came to t Ho Cake Channel Bridge. It is so alled because a party of engineers we shu up there during the railway co truction and for weeks had nothing ea but hot cakes. They called th plac Hot Cake Channel, and so it is own to this day.

The road goes over flats like t e al the way to the foot of the mou ains It winds about through the delta rossing the channels. Ths engineers d t wade through the mud to lay the route, and it was hard to find soli roadbed. At Mile 29 we wer onl thirty-two miles from the Bering River coal field, and twenty miles fart r on came to the narrow passage t ough which the road runs between th Miles and Childs Glaciers. Here th road crosses the Miles Glacier Bridge, hie cost more than $1.500,000 to uild, and then goes on its way up the mountains.

THINK of riding on a railroad tw hours or more with glaciers i sigh almost all the way! The Coppe River Valley is a great glacial garden Jus east of Eyak Lake is Scott cie which is a mile wide and six m s i length. It is only seven miles fr the tra, but is of so little account that it is s dom placed on the map. Sheridan Gl er is about fifteen miles from Co ova and within two miles of the rail ay. This glacier rises in snow fields ab a mile above sea level and ends in great bulb-shaped tongue which is onl four miles in length and three miles in lth. The terminus is a mighty pear of i 150 feet above sea level.

little east of Sheridan Glacier is Sh ian Glacier, which flows south-wes ard for a length of over seven mil and not far from the railway is Pi tt Glacier, an ice tongue more tha four miles in length. And then the are Saddlebag Glacier, which is sou of Pickett and Goodwin Glacier, whi expands into a bulb of two or thr miles in width where it enters the val . The McPherson Glacier, which can lso be seen from the railroad, is sev miles long, while Goodwin has a gre r length by three miles or mo

T two mightiest glaciers of the Co er River Valley are the Miles and the hilds. Childs Glacier is within a qua er of a mile or so of the track, and Mil Glacier is in plain sight as you sit in e cars facing the Childs Glacier Bri e. Of these two the Miles Glacier s l far the larger. It rises in the sno ields of the mountains and it is pro bly fifty miles long. Where it ent the Copper River Valley it spr ds out in a great bulb, which at he d is six and one-half miles across. It about twelve and one-half miles aro d the whole front. The waters of he lacier flow into the Copper River, out here is also a lake in front of it whi is about two miles in width and fou miles in length.

T train stopped on a switch near the ridge, in plain sight of both glacier and we had an hour or so to look at Childs Glacier, which is within en minutes' walk of the railroad. We eft the cars and made our way over a rai hrough a thicket of green bushes twi as high as our heads. We crossed ope places where there were great pat es of pink blossoms and ferns and gra that reached to our waists. As we ent onward the stones and boulders increased in number, and upon lea g the bushes we entered the ter-nir moraine of the glacier, which is ma up of rocks of all sizes down to pebbles as big as a pea.

T vegetation had now disappeared and we stood on the bank of a river whe glacial waters looked like skim mil We were right under a mighty ice all that ascended straight up from the ater to a greater height than that of t dome of our Capitol at Washington This wall is washed by the river. t e ends along the banks of the stream or ength of four miles and runs backwar for more than ten miles up the vall . It is composed of broken and m n cliffs of pale green ice, from whi ice masses are continually falling. t estimated that more than eight billion pounds of ice break off from it every year. That would be enough to load a train of cars 500 miles long, or enough to give eighty pounds to every man, woman and child in the United States and leave some to spare.

We could see the ice blocks breaking off as we stood under the wall on the opposite bank of the milky river. First came a cracking, which sounded like a battery of heavy artillery. Then a mass of pure white, weighing thousands of tons, broke loose from the glacier. It seemed to hang in midair for an instant. It then plunged down into the stream with a thunderous roar, sending up a high cloud of spray. A moment later the mist had cleared away, and the ice block or berg could be seen rising and falling, sending waves in billows almost to our feet.

THE breaking of the ice is caused by the melting and also by the force of the great ice river as it flows slowly down from the heights. The movement of the glacier varies in speed from time to time. During the years 1906, 1907 and 1908 it came forward only two or three feet a day, but in 1909 its motion increased to five or six feet, and in August, 1910, it was advancing at the rate of thirty or forty feet daily. After that it began to subside, and in June, 1911, it was moving at less than two feet per day.

Scientists have made careful observations of the Childs Glacier and photographed it from time to time when it was moving along at the rate of thirty or forty feet daily. One of them describes the changes from day to day. They would come out in the morning to find tons of ice resting where their cameras had stood the day previous and to see a great tree perhaps a hundred years old prone on the ground with its butt beneath the glacier. The night before the same tree had been upright and the ice some distance away. In this movement the ice tore trees out by the roots. It acted like so many mighty plows, ripping up the earth to bed rock, and carrying the turf and bushes along a level ten or fifteen feet higher than that of the plain.

It was this movement of the Childs Glacier that was advanced as one of the reasons why the United States government should not choose the Copper River and Northwestern Railway route as the best entrance to the interior of Alaska. The opponents of that route claimed that the glacier would some time advance so as to cover the railroad and wipe out the tracks. One end of the glacier is now not more than 1,500 feet from the bridge, and I am told that the ice has advanced that much in a single season. If this is so the finger known as the north lobe of the glacier will some day swallow the bridge. On the other hand, the advocates of the Copper River Valley route claim there is little danger of such an event and that it could be easily remedied should it occur.

A Revival in Utah

F R years Utah has been passed by as one of the impossible fields for successful evangelistic work. In act when any of the great continent-wid plans are made by denominational or ter-denominational leaders, Utah s l out. It has remained for the pas s and members of the churches of Ogd to prove that a revival is just as pos le in Utah as anywhere else.

A ttle search into the history of the chu hes of the state shows that no great uni effort has before been attempted.

A invitation to Mr. Henry Ostrom was xtended by the Ministerial Association of Ogden, backed by a committee of men that represented quite general the business and professional men of e community. This committee took the responsibility for the details con cted with the meetings. The com ittee included the treasurer of a whc sale hardware company, an officer of o of the largest lumber companies, st e senator, the general manager of m ufacturing company, a commission mar three men from the United States Dep tment of Agriculture, a superinten t of the Railway Mail Service, a loc , two dentists, four merchants, a Uni d States judge, and two capitalists.

For about a month before the meetings the churches united in special union prayer meetings. There was a class of about seventy-five that met following these meetings for special instructions in personal work. There were also many group prayer meetings in houses in different parts of the city. There were large numbers of people all over the country that were enlisted in prayer by letter. The meetings were held from March 2 to April 2 inclusive.

Invitations were given out in the streets and in the saloons, inviting the unfortunate to attend. People were urged to sing Gospel songs in their homes.

Meetings were held almost daily in places outside the especially constructed tabernacle: at a packing company's plant, in railway shops, laundries, an overall factory, the State School for Boys, State School for Deaf and Blind, High School, Weber Academy (Mormon), and other places. At one meeting sixty-five young people declared themselves willing to preach or become missionaries. The church membership of the city will be increased at least twenty per cent. as a result of these meetings.

Buy Your Tires at Factory Prices

YOU can buy Buckskin Tires from us at prices which are "the lowest in America" for a tire guaranteed for 4000 miles. This is a positive fact. And here is the reason:

We have no branches, no salesmen, no dealers. By shipping direct to the man who owns a car, we have reduced our selling expense to a minimum. And we have devised other methods of keeping down overhead charges. All our money goes into making a thoroughly good black tread tire—dependable to the last mile.

Let us tell you about our attractive offer direct to auto owners.

BUCKSKIN
PLAIN & NON-SKID
Guaranteed TIRES

Buckskin Tires are absolutely good tires in every way, shape and form. Nothing but the purest Para rubber and the strongest Sea Island cotton fabric are used in their manufacture. Every tire and tube is rigidly inspected before leaving the factory. We are selling Buckskins now to hundreds who bought Buckskins last year.

OUR GUARANTEE—Every Buckskin—patented basket-weave non-skid, or plain tread—is guaranteed for 4000 miles. If you don't get this mileage—and a majority of Buckskin users invariably get much more—a credit in full will be allowed for the unexpired mileage and we'll pay expressage both ways.

A Sensible Car at a Sensible

Our analysis of the Spring season shows the people are coming more and more to a commonsense basis of buying a car.

They're buying better cars all the time. They're paying a little more money for them.

But they're looking them over closer. They're demanding a car for all-round use.

They want to drive at a sensible speed. "The area of useless speed" they shy at.

Particularly is this true of the small towns in America.

It is fortunate that Chalmers set out to reach just such people. For the Chalmers business in the smaller towns of America has risen by leaps and bounds this year. The increase over a year ago is more than 900 per cent.

No doubt the price of the 3400 . p Chalmers has been a great point in s fa $1090 buys about all anyone can a fo a car.

Three years ago (if it had been pos ple to produce a car so modern, so qui o feet, and so reliable) this same car w ld brought $2000.

And there would have been mig ty profit at such a figure.

Skill in design, skill in manufact re, in service has brought down the co of 3400 r. p. m. Chalmers.

There's a smaller profit in this car han Chalmers ever built. Yet it is by all dds most successful. And a very sens le helps make it the success it is today.

Value

OWNERSHIP of a motor car is but a means to an end—and that end is Service. All other considerations are of minor importance. Consequently, Service is the element that accurately determines Value.

When we assert that Maxwell Motor Cars represent an exceeding value, we base that statement on concrete and indisputable evidence of a service record that stands unparalleled.

Being a matter of vital consequence to you, we again refer to this fact: that a stock Maxwell car conclusively proved its worth by traveling 500 miles a day for forty-four consecutive days and nights—without a motor stop—without motor repairs or readjustments—averaging 21.88 miles per gallon of gasoline.

The World's Motor Non-Stop Mileage Record, established in January, 1916, by a Maxwell Touring Car is authenticated by the American Automobile Association. It is not open to question.

Facts outweigh opinions. Knowing the facts, your own judgment must suggest a motor car purchase that will be an investment for, rather than a mortgage against, the future.

The prices, including Full Equipment, are:

Heisuni's Test

By DELAVAN L. PIERS

AS the great Pacific mail steamer neared the Golden Gate, groups of passengers stood on the deck eagerly gazing at the outline of the shore as it came more and more clearly into view. Some were returning to their beloved land after a long absence; others now saw America for the first time, not knowing what surprises and adventures might be in store for them. Among the latter was an attractive, bright-eyed, olive-complexioned Korean maid, named Whang Heisuni. She was coming to meet her affianced husband, who had set out for America a few years before to seek his fortune in the new land. Heisuni, as her friends called her, had scarcely seen her future husband, but her wise parents had looked into his character and ability and had satisfactorily arranged the match. Heisuni was a Christian girl, having been educated in the mission school in Syen Chun. Her fiancé, So Chi-ho, was also a Christian, otherwise Heisuni would not have consented to marry him, for she was a young woman of character and took literally the command of the Bible, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers."

Eagerly Heisuni scanned the crowd as the steamer made fast to the dock and with a smile of real satisfaction she saw the well-dressed young Korean who waved to her. Heisuni's friends, the Rev. and Mrs. George S. McCune, missionaries in whose care she had traveled over the broad ocean, introduced the young couple, Mr. So politely greeted his bride-to-be with the Korean phrase:

"Have you come in peace?"

"I have come in peace, by the grace of God," she replied shyly, in Christian style.

The happy party went to the home of friends to talk over the details of the approaching wedding. Everything had been arranged; why should they wait?

Then something happened. Heisuni came to Mrs. McCune, after her interview with So, and said decidedly but with tears in her eyes:

"Please don't make arrangements for me to be married. I cannot marry Mr. So—at least not now."

"But why?" asked Mrs. McCune. "Is he not a good young man and a Christian?"

Heisuni only shook her head and repeated that she could not marry him.

Mr. and Mrs. McCune made inquiries about So among the Koreans and American missionaries in San Francisco. All they learned was in his favor.

THE missionary friends decided to make one more effort to carry out the original program and invited the young people to meet in their rooms. Then something else happened. As Mr. McCune passed the door of a room where Heisuni was alone he heard her voice praying in Korean:

"O God, help me to do what is right. Do not let me be foolish or wilful. Help Mr. and Mrs. McCune to see that it is best that I should not marry So. Oh give me strength to do what is thy will for me. Amen."

Drawing the girl aside Mr. McCune asked her to explain her reasons for refusing the husband her parents had chosen for her.

"Well, Moxa," she said, "I will tell you. So is not a Christian—at least not the kind of a Christian I must marry."

"And why do you say that? Is he not a good man and a member of the church?"

"Yes, he may be," Heisuni replied, "but he is not the right kind of a Christian. When he met me at the steamer he said: 'Have you come in peace' but he did not say, as we Christians do, 'Have you come in peace, by the grace of God?' He left God out of account."

"But," said Mr. McCune, "that is only because he has acquired the American habit of speaking."

"No, Moxa," said Heisuni, "he has left God out of account in other things too. When he talked to me about marriage, he told me of the beautiful jewels and clothes he would buy for me and of the fine house we would live in. He told me of the $300 h had saved for the wedding, of the mo he was making, and of what a gooc ime we would have, but he did not se to be interested in the church or th nission, and said nothing about wh we would do for God and for those w do not know God. And when I aske him some things about the Bible he d not understand. Why, just think it! He could not even recite the bo s of the Bible! No, I cannot marry Mi o."

THE young man was called and ard the decision with evident su rise and chagrin. He renewed his prc stations of love and expressed his e lest desire to marry Heisuni on any nditions she might name.

Finally Heisuni said:

"I will tell you what I will I cannot marry So now, but if h will take the $300 that he was going to end on me and on the wedding and v go and study for three months in a ible institute so that he may know od's Word and learn how to work fo im, then I will wait for him and will rry him when he comes out."

It was a severe test for So, bu the girl was worth waiting and w ing for, and he consented to the cond ons

In the meantime Heisuni tra eled East in a Pullman car with Mi and Mrs. McCune. As the party b me acquainted with other passengers any were attracted to the sweet-face intelligent Korean girl with her nall vocabulary of picturesque broken nglish and her quaint accent. One g tleman in particular liked to talk wi her and to hear her tell of her peop and her impressions of America. On day as they were conversing a nce remark caused Heisuni to turn q kly toward him and to ask eagerly: You know Jesus? He your friend? You Christian?"

"No," replied her companio "I am afraid I'm not what you l a Christian, and I haven't been to c rch for many years."

"Oh," she exclaimed, "you ove Jesus. He love you. He die for u!"

But Heisuni's English was not ual to the occasion. Hastily excusin erself, she made her way rapidly t the rear of the car where Mr. M une was sitting, and she exclaimed citedly:

"O Moxa, there's a heathen m in the seat there! You go talk to him He no love Jesus! You tell him love J s!"

While Mr. McCune made his ay forward Heisuni remained behi to pray. The missionary was l dly received and explained that the K ean girl had been much interested i her companion and that Christ mea so much to her and had done so mu for her people that she was deeply a ous that her new American friend s uld also know her heavenly Friend.

Other conversations followed ing the few remaining days of the jo ey, but the two parted unsatisfied. Few weeks later a letter came to M cCune from San Francisco which ead somewhat as follows:

Dear Mr. McCune:

I want you to thank the little I ean lady for what she said to me in the ra oad train and for her real interest in my sou She was the first that has spoken to me out Christ in many years. Tell her that ave begun going to church again and expe oon to make open confession of my faith her Master and mine.

Yours sincerely, G—— S—.

Heisuni went on her way rej ing and scattering kind words and C istlike deeds along her path in the ew World. After the three months her fiancé's probation were ended, she returned to San Francisco to re em her promise and to become his de. So had used his time well and wa ow an earnest and interested Bible st ent and Christian worker. Thoughts of Love

"IN the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love," quoted the Boy sentimentally. He was standing in the garden, arrayed in the glory of the first white flannel suit of the season. The sunlight slanted goldenly through the very young leaves, the crocuses were springing up through the very young grass. It was a gay, happy world, full of songs and laughter and mirth—tinted in blue and gold and green. The Boy looked down at his immaculate white trousers complacently.

"In the spring," he quoted with a bit more sentiment than he had shown the first time, "in the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns——"

"Shuh!" murmured the Girl, quite rudely interrupting him. She was kneeling in front of a very new flower bed dressed in the picturesque but rather dusty comfort of a green linen garden smock. She held a trowel firmly in a determined but grimy little hand. All at once she turned her head, and blinking in the sunlight, looked up into the Boy's face.

"If you say that—that bromide again," said the Girl, "I shall go mad. And you shall go home. Every spring ever since I was born, I think, I've heard some one say that a young man's fancy——"

The Girl broke off and fell to digging spitefully in the brown soil of the very new flower bed.

The Boy looked around absent-mindedly for a place to sit down. But the ground was damp, and the garden bench was muddy, and he remembered his white flannel spotlessness, and decided to stand up. "If I had known that you were grubbing in the dirt this afternoon," he murmured not very pleasantly, "I might have come to call dressed in overalls. Then I could have helped you dig."

The Girl turned around again and looked blinkingly at the springtime glory of the Boy.

"My!" she exclaimed. "We are dressed up, aren't we? Are we going to tea, or a reception? But why is all this grandeur wasted on me? And besides, I'm not grubbing. I'm planting flowers. Somebody's got to make gardens while the rest of us are too dressed up to—to do anything but stand around."

The Boy reflected that she had probably noticed his dubious glance at the muddy garden bench and the rather damp grass.

"Why, I just felt like being dressed up," he told the Girl. "You needn't laugh! I don't feel that way often—as you do. It's just the weather and the sunshine."

"And the springtime," teased the Girl. She seemed to have a talent for interrupting. "For 'in the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love,' and new clothes, and baseball, and tennis, and a few other things that all go with the season. Oh-h!" screamed the Girl suddenly, as her trowel struck a fat, wriggly worm. "O-h!" she screamed again, as she dropped the trowel and retreated toward the house.

It is not hard to acquire one's own end with grace, through diplomacy. The Boy was not undiplomatic. "Let's go on the porch," he suggested. "The garden is full of worms. It's teeming with them. You need a man to dig garden beds anyway. To-morrow I'll come in the overalls, and do your digging for you."

Diplomacy won, and the Girl, still shuddering at the memory of the worm, suffered herself to be led to the porch.

It was a glorious day. Even one who was unpoetically inclined would have felt the heaven-sent charm of it. The Girl sank back in the softness of a cushioned armchair and sighed a sigh of sheer content. The Boy, seated beside her, glanced at her with the delight of a man who has never been able to write and suddenly finds his mind brimming over with sonnets. For the Girl, dusty garden smock and all, matched the day. The sunlight found answering gleams of gold in her brown hair, her eyes held the glamour of youth and mirth, her lips seemed curved for laughter and music, and . . .

"What are you thinking?" asked the Boy for want of something better to say. One cannot always recite the sonnets that are crowding for utterance. One does not always dare. "What are you thinking," questioned the Boy.

The Girl smiled reflectively up at the sky.

"Why," she told him, "I'm thinking that it's a wonderful day. I'm thinking that the sky's blue and that there will soon be flowers in my garden. I'm thinking that I guess I'll go up to my room and fix my hair, and wash off all this mud, and put on a new spring frock—so that you won't be the only one who's dressed up. And then I think I'll come down and be polite and sweet-tempered and lovely. And then, if you're good, I think I'll ask you to stay to supper. Will you?"

The Boy leaned eagerly forward.

"Will I!" he ejaculated fervently "Will I? O Girl! if you only knew how happy it makes me when you are the least bit nice to me——"

The Girl laughed annoyingly. "I'm always nice to you," she told him "You think that I'm mean sometimes, but I'm only talking to you for your own good. You know that you are silly—once in a while. I'm always nice to you!" And she smiled up at him with a flash of blue eyes from behind long lashes.

The vines on the porch were just beginning to sprout. They made no sort of a screen, but—well, it was spring!

The Boy reached blindly for the Girl's hand.

"Dear," he murmured, "dear, if you only realized—if you only knew——"

The Boy, who a moment before had been a budding poet, was reduced to a stammering schoolboy. "O Girl!" he cried suddenly; "if you could ever guess how I love you!"

The Girl drew her hand away—she jerked it.

"Listen!" she said to the Boy. "This foolishness has got to stop. You're not in love with me at all; it's just the springtime. You said so yourself. You said: 'In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.' Well, that's the truth 'In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns'—lightly. It's just one of the characteristics of the season—it's just custom, habit. You'd fall in love with anybody, if she were half-way good-looking, because it's springtime. It's not me that you're in love with."

"And now," said the Girl, "I'm going in to get dressed. And then I'm going to get supper. I think I'll make a strawberry shortcake—you can let your fancy turn to that. Are you going to stay and stop being foolish, or are you going to go home and moon?"

The Boy, decidedly dashed as to countenance, considered the question. It was springtime, and a young man's fancy . . .

It is most annoying to be very much in earnest, and then have no one believe you because it is a wonderful springtime day. The boy looked peevishly out across the glowing landscape, looked far out to the horizon line where a tiny pink cloud was spreading a rose-colored glow over the whole of the world. All the world seemed bright with the joy of youth and happiness and love.

The Boy in all the glory of his springtime white suit looked deeply into the heart of the sunset. The pinkness reminded him vaguely of strawberry shortcake—and the Girl made wonderful shortcake. With a certain pang the boy shoved sentiment out of his mind and filled it with very material thoughts.

"I'll stay," answered the Boy.

"In the spring a young man's fancy . . ."

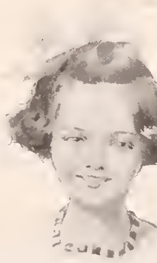
Tulips and Tit-Bits

A May-Morning Greeting

Any woman who will can make the May breakfast the most charming half-hour of the day.

One flower will aid it, if you can't have a bouquet. A single Tulip is very artistic.

Then have bubble-grains with it—Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice. They seem like breakfast bonbons.



Everyone Will Smile

Good cheer is the main thing at breakfast. And it isn't universal, you know. It is up to you housewives to start the day with a smile.

One can't frown at flowers. And these flaky, crisp bubbles are the daintiest dainty that ever met folks at breakfast. Have them both on your May-morning tables.

Then remember that these flavory morsels are the utmost in whole-grain foods. Every food cell is exploded. Every atom feeds. It doesn't take many Puffed Grains to form a hearty breakfast.

Foods so fascinating and so scientific ought to have a big place in your home. No other wheat or rice foods compare with them. Prof. Anderson's process is the only way that fits every granule for food.

Puffed Wheat 12c
Puffed Rice 15c
Except in Far West
Corn Puffs—Bubbles of Corn Hearts—15c

A whole-grain food, to be a complete food, must be made wholly digestible. Each food cell must be broken. And each grain contains more than 100 million of them.

In Prof. Anderson's process, these cells are steam-exploded. Not a cell remains intact.

Wheat, rice and corn are the only grains we puff. Those grains should be served in this way. Not for breakfast only, but in bowls of milk. They are double-value foods.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

"For freedom did Christ set us free." Gal. 5 : 1.

A touching story is told of the old slave days A Christian man entered a salesroom, where, among others, a beautiful white girl was put up for auction. He saw the horror and fear on her face, and started bidding against the trader, who ran him up to the topmost price. Finally they desisted, leaving him her owner, though practically bankrupt. The girl dejectedly followed him from the vile associations of the place to his hotel, and could not believe her ears when he told her that she would be free to go where she chose, as soon as her emancipation papers could be made out and signed. Dazed and bewildered, she threw herself at his feet with inexpressible emotion, only slowly beginning to realize what freedom meant; but the contents of that wo could only be revealed to her as days a weeks succeeded and opened into yea So when we are told that the Son of G has made us free, we can merely skim t surface of that great announcement. V are free from the condemnation of the l and the accusation of conscience, free fro the power of darkness and translated in the kingdom of the Son of God's lo free from the clogging weight of the pa free with the freedom of the sons of Go But what it all means we shall never kn until we have reached that other li where we shall be able to realize our loftie ideals, untrammeled by the sins that so ea ly beset, or the weight of the dull lethar which so often casts its spell over our spir

The Beginnings of Christian Liberty

By Arthur H. Howland

IF one should make a list of, say, the twenty most important chapters in the Bible, this fifteenth chapter of Acts would be included in the list. Some might place it in the first ten or twelve most important chapters. Certain it is that it marks a great turning-point in the religious history of the world. Dr Olin A. Curtis, of Drew Seminary, used to say that the early church councils were like battle grounds. Great minds, great souls battled fiercely, passionately for what they believed to be true and right. The leaders of opposing sides were often equally sincere. There was the one terrific, dominant ambition; that was to find the truth.

The teacher should look up, or have the pupil look up, a brief history of some of the most important of the church councils, such as the Councils of Nice, Constantinople, Constance and Trent. Since the Reformation none of the church councils can really be called ecumenical, that is, representing the whole of Christendom. The Catholic Church still holds its councils, and still calls them ecumenical, not regarding the Protestants as a part of the true organic church. The last great Catholic Ecumenical Council was the Council of the Vatican, held in 1869-1870. There have been two great ecumenical Protestant councils on missionary work, the first held at New York in 1900, the second at Edinburgh in 1910. The church councils of the early centuries were accompanied by great pomp. Archbishops, legates, bishops, attended with almost royal splendor. The earlier councils were summoned by the Roman emperor, he or his representative presiding.

But at this council in Jerusalem there was no pomp, and we can believe very little ceremony. A group of earnest, sturdy, humble men, and, perhaps, some women, got together to discuss a problem, which they recognized as of the first magnitude: "Were the Gentile Christians to be brought under the requirements of the ancient Mosaic code?" All the members of the council were Jews. They had been brought up to believe that the only way to please God was to be a Jew or to become a Jew. They had been brought up to think that they could not even visit the homes of those who were not Jews without contamination. The ceremonies prescribed by the Mosaic law were not matters of option, but of obligation. To turn away from Moses was like turning away from God.

The great Galilean teacher, whose mighty influence had swayed their hearts and swept them into a new life of spiritual splendor and triumph, had implied that he had greater authority than that of Moses. "Moses told you to do this," he had declared; "I tell you to do this." And yet in every case the thing that he told them to do included or implied all that Moses had requ d. He went deeper, farther, higher. "T ık not that I am come to destroy the l ," he had said; "I am not come to de y it but to fulfil." But since Pent st they had been so busy with their w work and the new pleasures of ir worship that they had had little ne to think about ceremonial de ls. They went, doubtless, with occas al sacrifices to the temple, but they f d that they did not need to go the te le to get the sense of God's pres e. They knew he was with them. He s with them all the time. At their ho s, at their work, on the streets of the y, along the great Roman highway r on little footpaths across the s speaking to friends or strangers a t their new joy, standing unafraid b re angry magistrates, shut up in k dungeons, they knew he was with t n, the God of Israel, who had sent is Spirit into their hearts when y had accepted Jesus as his anoi d Messenger and their Saviour from n. But all the time they were Jews, r-cumcised, recognizing an oblig n to the ancient law.

But Gentiles had been getting bl d too. Cornelius had been ble l. Gentiles in Pisidian Antioch had n blessed, and at Iconium and Lystra d Derbe, and in Syrian Antioch. t these outposts of the faith the w believers had been so happy in ir new experience and had mingle o freely with their Jewish fellow Christ s that no one had thought of such b r-ersome matters as circumcision, s i-fices and other ceremonies.

The headquarters of this whole w movement was at Syrian Antioch, w e Paul and Barnabas were stayin s leaders of the Christian group. S e conservatives came up from Jerusa ı, and said: "This thing is all wrong. It is scandalous for you Jews to ming o freely with these uncircumcised Gent s. They must be circumcised and kee e law of Moses." The others of e Antioch church were greatly dist d and said to Paul and Baranbas and e or two others: "You had better go d n to Jerusalem and see about this."

And so the First Church Co il was called to order in the Holy C y. The representatives of the conserva e element were very outspoken b e the council came to order. They e doubtless thoroughly conscientious, t-tling for the thing they believed t e right. But the arguments bro t forward by the other side were o unanswerable that they seemed to e little to say in the council itself. l Peter stood up and told again at had happened to Cornelius. "God t no difference between us and them o why should we make any distinctio " They were filled with the Holy S t and their hearts were purified by is power, while they were still uncirc -cised. This proves unanswerably t circumcision is not necessary to n experience of God's presence and l r and power. The yoke of the anc t law with all its ceremonial detail s un arable. We have not been able to ep it; our fathers have not been abl to keep it. Why, then, should we sk them to keep it?"

T en Paul and Barnabas told the sai story—uncircumcised Gentiles had received salvation and the gift of the oly Ghost. Then James, doubtless Ja s the brother of Jesus, who was evi ntly the chairman of the council, ros to speak. (The record of Acts 12 shows that James, John's brother, the on of Zebedee, had been killed.) He ferred to the reports that had been ma ; he quoted the ancient Scriptur to show that Gentiles were included God's plan of blessing, and advis the council wisely: "Wherefore my entence is, that we trouble not the who from among the Gentiles are urned to God." He suggested fou pecifications that should be made in the new code of religious ethics, only fou re was the real beginning of Christian iberty. It was this decision that ma possible the mighty expansion of the eligion of Jesus far beyond the nar w limits of Judaism. Because the men were brave enough, and wise enough, and sufficiently in touch with God to make this great decision, we tod are free Christians instead of bei tied hand and foot with the stiff cer onialism of Israel. Indeed, if it had not been for this decision it is dou ful if we would be Christians at all, ecause a Christianity fettered by the osaic code would never have had suf ent missionary zeal and missionary power to reach out and compel oth nations to accept the evangel of Jes

Th council wrote a letter to send bac to Antioch, explaining its position. It ust have done the hearts of Paul and Barnabas good to hear themselves refe ed to as "our beloved Barnabas and Paul, men who have hazarded thei lives for the name of our Lord Jes Christ." They must have thought of t persecutions at Pisidian Antioch, the iot at Iconium, the stoning at Lys a, and been glad that in the face of all ese hazards they had not flinched. The erusalem church sent two messengers Judas and Silas, back with Paul and Barnabas to carry the message. The hurch at Antioch rejoiced at the goo news. They had some good meetings Judas and Silas preaching some vig ous Gospel sermons and strengthening e believers in their faith. Then Jud went back to Jerusalem while Sila stayed at Antioch, assisting Paul and Barnabas in their work there.

T beginnings of Christian liberty and f Christian ethics! The Christian cod has changed greatly since that earl day. We are finding out new obli tions of duty constantly, and we are so finding that many obligations and prohibitions which seemed vital in t past are no longer binding. Paul him lf took the ground in his epistles that t was not necessarily and always wro to eat meat that had been presentl as a sacrifice to idols. It soon cam to be felt that there were greater obli tions in Christian conduct that had ot been touched upon at this first chu h council. The council, for insta , had said nothing about slavery. It did not repeat and emphasize the great social message of Jesus. It took up only one of the really great social problems that perplex the conscience and the will of the human race. It is probable that these early Christians were so conscious of an all-embracing love in their hearts that they could not understand how any one, having received the Gospel of Jesus, could wrong a fellow creature. They knew that that Gospel of love would ultimately revolutionize and redeem the world. They had not laid hands upon the great fundamental moral precepts of the Mosaic law. Men were still to be just to one another; men were still to love their neighbors. And throbbing through these old demands of justice was the pulsating love of the heart of Christ, that heart that had been stilled in death on Calvary in order that men might learn how to love not only their neighbors, but their enemies, and in order that the love of God might find its way into every human heart.

For the older classes the study of the evolution of Christian ethics will be interesting. Trace the various waves in the progress of Christian ideals. The era of monasticism gave way to the new freedom of the Reformation. Then came Puritanism, which is just now to some extent letting go its grip. There has all the time been the tendency to lay burdens like this old burden of the Mosaic code upon the free soul of the believer. Of course, there is danger of going too far on the road of liberty, but there is no danger to the soul or to the group who will keep alive upon its altar a flaming fire of love for Christ, and a burning desire to translate this love for him into loving service for their fellow men.

There is a new call sounding in the church today: the call to have done with trifles, to cease to care for non-essentials and for externals, to take a new hard grip on the tough moral problems of our day, to find the way to end war, to end social injustice, to put an end to poverty. Science, as applied to man and society, is finding out that the teachings of Jesus formulate the only reasonable and hopeful plan of human conduct and of social organization. If the church does not look out, other forces and organizations than herself will bring about that revolution of society which will really put into actual operation some of these basis teachings of the Nazarene.

Generous Gifts for Stricken Europe

A READER recently sent us five shares of stock in a certain corporation, directing that the same be s d and the proceeds applied to the Chr ian Herald Fund for the Relief of the idows and Orphans of the War in ope. In his letter he said:

> Tl contribution represents a genuine sacri e on my part, as it represents the results of m y weeks of hard toil, but I make the sacri e gladly, because I consider it my duty as a hristian to do so. I wish the money to be ap ied to the relief of the Armenians, Jews or P s, as I saw it announced in the columns of yo paper that you are accepting contributions or this purpose. I do not desire it to be appl to the relief of the families of soldiers, but the relief of non-combatants. I do not belie in aiding the families of soldiers while the ar is still being fought, for this simply enco ges warfare and helps to delay the end of th war. I desire this contribution of mine to h those who are suffering through no fault their own, directly or indirectly. I am unalterably opposed to all warfare. I can find nothing, absolutely nothing, in the Gospel of our Lord and Redeemer which can in any way be interpreted to excuse warfare. War is the work of Satan. It inspires hatred and violence and feeds vain ambitions. War is farther removed from our Divine Lord than the North Pole from the South Pole, notwithstanding the teachings of certain prominent misguided persons, as Theodore Roosevelt and others.
> I do not desire any publicity in regard to this contribution. In your printed acknowledgments in the Christian Herald, you can acknowledge it "In His Name," for I am indeed giving it in the name of Him who first gave freely to me.

THE gift realized $160.05, and in accordance with the desire of the anonymous donor it was apportioned equally between the Christian Herald Committee in Constantinople for Armenian Relief, and the Christian Herald Committee operating among the Polish sufferers at Lodz and elsewhere.

NEW PERFECTION

The Long Chimney Oil Stove

Why is a Lamp Chimney Long?

"WHY, to create enough draft and make a clean, steady flame—take off the long chimney, or put on a shorter one, and the flame smokes."

And a long chimney is every bit as necessary for a clean, hot, odorless flame on an oil cook stove as it is on a lamp. The New Perfection Oil Cook Stove has long chimneys on all burners—long blue enameled ones—that's why the New Perfection is cooking for more than two million housewives. It is why there are more New Perfections sold than all other oil cook stoves combined.

The New Perfection Oil Cook Stoves in these two million homes will be cooking away as reliably and efficiently two years from today as they will cook the 2,000,000 dinners tonight.

The New Perfection averages a fuel cost of six cents a day for a family of six. No coal to carry, no fires to build or tend.

You need some oil cook stove this summer if you want a cool kitchen and freedom from drudgery. But if you want permanent satisfaction be sure the stove you buy bears the name New Perfection and has the long blue chimney.

New Perfection Stoves, in many styles and sizes, are sold by most good dealers. Prices from $3.00 up.

nor roll of stirring drums, with deeds of love and mercy, the heavenly Kingdom comes.” They lift themselves on tiptoe when they reach the refrain of their battle hymn, O, Zion, Haste, Thy Mission High Fulfilling: “Publish glad tidings, tidings of peace, tidings of Jesus; redemption and release!” (It might not do, and yet there is something in the idea, that a good patriotic song would be a good thing with which to open every day's session of both houses of Congress.)

THE eleven sessions of the congress were progressive and cumulative in their programs and power. The President of the United States was a guest throughout the first evening when General Secretary William B. Millar reviewed the Movement's advance of a decade, and Dr. John R. Mott showed how war had added to the missionary responsibility of American laymen. The terrible casualties of that war, the unparalleled destruction of property, the vast employment of capital to carry it on, the ghastly sacrifice of boys in the ranks, the huge encampments of prisoners of war, have created, in Dr. Mott's opinion, a call for Christian service in the years to come, such as the world had never before experienced. Upon American Christian laymen must fall the initiative and the brunt of constructive and reconstructive tasks after the war.

And so the great convention began as it ended, with an appeal to the heroic. This is the secret of the movement's tremendous impetus: that it calls on men to make supreme sacrifices and do supreme deeds for Christ.

The prevailing idea of the congress was that the day of real things had arrived; the day when real men must hear real calls and heed them. A. J. Wallace, former lieutenant-governor of California, declared that in early life he had received a call into the ministry, and had applied himself with diligence to heeding it; and shortly afterwards, he said, he received another call which he struggled against, but eventually had to obey a call out of the ministry. And he charged the ministers in the audience to have their ears open to such calls, as in his experience he had met some whose talents and energies would seem to indicate that a call out of the ministry might set them free to doing real things in the Kingdom.

It was mentioned that one layman is supporting a home mission station in Korea with thirteen American missionaries. The same man supports representatives in Cuba and in Africa. It was not suggested that every member of the movement approximate this, but I cite it here as one of the standards of service lifted up by this organization.

Shailer Mathews, president of the Chicago University, played verbal blacksmith and struck spiritual sparks from an invisible anvil in rapid succession. He proved that missions are a method of realizing Christian unity, and that Christian unity was a long step toward real internationalism. “The things in which we agree are mightier than the things in which we differ,” said Mr. Mathews, with the entire approval of his audience; and then among other things, said the following: “Unity of our forces is compelled by the greatness of our common task”; “Now is the time for great Christian adventures”; “We are in danger of losing our national soul.” And right in there he told of the Japanese reporter who was asked to name the chief objection in Japan to Christianity, and who replied that there was now no real objection to Christianity, but there used to be, for the Japanese thought that Christianity made cowards of men. But the sight of Christians fighting as fiercely as barbarians in the present European war disabused the Japanese mind, and now there was no real objection to Christianity. (So, possibly the efficient government of Japan will add Christianity to the military tactics of the nation.)

Mr. Robert E. Speer both warned and challenged the convention, by declaring that if God's saving work in the world is to be done, “it can only be done by Christian people working together.” This is by no means all that Mr. Speer said in the different sessions, but he said this with all the conviction of his great and serious mind. In an address he showed that the bond to unite the Americas was not trade, was not common political ideals, was not common ideals of peace and brotherhood and high thought, but that the force of Christianity alone can accomplish it. “They are the only ties that hold today across the chasms of racial hate. Just now only bonds of Christian love and fellowship remain between nations.”

Then Mr. Speer told a story with great effect. He was traveling in South America along one of its densely shaded rivers; the boat, which depended upon wood for fuel, was tied up at the bank towards twilight, while the crew went ashore to cut a supply of wood. He was sitting at his stateroom window watching the flickering lights on shore, and the moon and stars through the tree-tops, when suddenly he heard a splash in the dark waters near the boat. Then over his head he heard the patter of running feet and excited whispers, then a silence. Then suddenly from a point at a distance far off in the swiftly rushing stream there came a cry, a cry which Mr. Speer said he would never in this world forget, the cry of a man: “Oh, hombre! Oh, hombre!” The river thereabouts was filled with alligators, and the unfortunate man had been caught before his friends could possibly reach him. And that cry, said the speaker, was the cry of the heart of mankind, of lost mankind to their brothers who were safe and strong: “Oh, hombre! Oh, man! Oh, brother! Oh, friend!” That, said Mr. Speer, is the cry that the Laymen's Missionary Movement must hear and answer.

AND so onward and upward swelled the note of service and sacrifice. The rush of hundreds of thousands to enlist to fight for their country's flag was cited as an example of what men can do when they will of service and sacrifice. “Enlist” was the order of the day for Christian service. “The church is those who definitely enlist for service,” asserted one speaker, and then he asked, “Can you enlist for service?” It

MEAL-TIME CONSCIENCE

What Do the Children Drink?

There are times when mother or father feeds the youngsters something that they know children should not have. Perhaps it is some rich dessert but more often it is tea or coffee.

It is better to have some delicious, hot food-drink that you can take yourself and feed to your children, conscious that it will help and strengthen, but never hurt them.

A York-state lady says: “I used coffee many years in spite of the conviction that it injured my nervous system and produced my nervous headaches. While visiting a friend I was served with Postum and I determined to get a package and try it myself. The result was all that could be desired—a delicious, finely flavored, richly colored beverage. Since I quit coffee, Postum has worked wonders for me.

“My husband, who had suffered from kidney trouble when drinking coffee, quit the coffee and took up Postum with me and since drinking Postum he has felt stronger and better, with no indication of kidney trouble.

“You may be sure I find it a great comfort to have a warm drink at meals that I can give my children, with a clear conscience that it will help and not hurt them as coffee or tea would.”

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c pkgs.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both forms are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

seemed like a simple question, and it is a simple question even in regard to military duty—until the need arises.

S. D. Gordon, who said that the world is God's prodigal son, said also that the church needs money with the red tinge of sacrifice upon it; that the greatest thing anybody can do is to pray; and that prayer takes on the quality of the life the man lives: "So it is deep or shallow, narrow or broad, as the case may be." And then he spoke of the whole world as being in an emergency and that the Laymen's Missionary Movement must go to its help in the spirit of prayer.

Bishop Arthur S. Lloyd asked the convention to realize that God's good name is in the keeping of Christians. Andrew Campbell White in a magnificent call to service on the last night aroused the delegates to high resolves as to their "keeping" before the world above every other name, the name of Christ.

Mr. White showed the vast latent resources of the church in men and money, but Mr. Speer brought the congress to a close with a powerful appeal to the men of the Laymen's Missionary Movement to depend upon no other resources than God himself. He spoke as though he saw not alone the one thousand delegates before him, but the hundreds of thousands of other men throughout the American churches upon whose steadfastness and zeal depends the battle of the Lord. He spoke to the manhood of the Christian church, and in unshakable confidence that God can and will bring to pass what is his great design to the human race, called upon the men of the Laymen's Missionary Movement to regard all human and material resources inefficient without God, in whom (not in ourselves) reside our spiritual resources. And the great congress was brought to a close with this thought of God as the sufficient motive, the sufficient wisdom, the sufficient resource, the sufficient society and the sure confidence of victory to his sons upon earth.

THE program for the forward work of the Movement adopted by the convention includes the promoting of the every-member canvass for systematic and methodical giving in churches; increased emphasis upon the standards of stewardship; a call to every man to devote a portion of his life, time and money to the Lord's service; instruction of the youth of the churches in standards of stewardship of life and property; extension of the work in rural communities and among colored men; and a comprehensive plan of educational work throughout the world.

in self-defense against the illegal conduct of British warfare, while fighting a bitter struggle for national existence Germany had to resort to the hard but effective weapon of submarine warfare.

As matters stand, the German Government cannot but reiterate regret that the sentiments of humanity which the Government of the United States extends with such fervor to the unhappy victims of submarine warfare are not extended with the same warmth of feeling to many millions of women and children who, according to the avowed intention of the British Government, shall be starved, and who by sufferings, shall force the victorious armies of the Central Powers into ignominious capitulation.

The German Government, in agreement with the German people, fails to understand this discrimination, all the more as it has repeatedly and explicitly declared itself ready to use the submarine weapon in strict conformity with the rules of international law as recognized before the outbreak of the war, if Great Britain likewise was ready to adapt the conduct of warfare to these rules.

Several attempts made by the Government of the United States to prevail upon the British Government to act accordingly failed because of flat refusal on the part of the British Government. Moreover, Great Britain again and again has violated international law, surpassing all bounds in outraging neutral rights. The latest measure adopted by Great Britain, declaring German bunker coal contraband and establishing conditions under which English bunker coal alone is supplied to neutrals, is nothing but an unheard-of attempt by way of exaction to force neutral tonnage into the service of British trade war.

The German people knows that the Government of the United States has the power to confine the war to armed forces of the belligerent countries, in the interest of humanity and maintenance of international law. The Government of the United States would have been certain of attaining this end had it been determined to insist against Great Britain on the incontrovertible rights to freedom of the seas. But, as matters stand, the German people is under the impression that the Government of the United States, while demanding that Germany, struggling for existence, shall restrain the use of an effective weapon, and while making compliance with these demands a condition for maintenance of relations with Germany, confines itself to protests against illegal methods adopted by Germany's enemies. Moreover, the German people knows to what considerable extent its enemies are supplied with all kinds of war material from the United States.

It will, therefore, be understood that the appeal made by the Government of the United States to sentiments of humanity and principles of international law cannot, under the circumstances, meet the same hearty response from the German people which such an appeal otherwise always is certain to find here.

If the German Government nevertheless is resolved to go to the utmost limit of concession, it has been guided not alone by the friendship connecting the two great nations for over one hundred years but also by the thought of the great doom which threatens the entire civilized world should the cruel and sanguinary war be extended and prolonged.

The German Government, conscious of Germany's strength, twice within the last few months announced before the world its readiness to make peace on a basis safeguarding Germany's vital interests, thus indicating that it is not Germany's fault if peace is still withheld from the nations of Europe. The German Government feels all the more justified in declaring that responsibility could not be borne before the forum of mankind and in history if, after twenty-one months of the war's duration, the submarine question under discussion between the German Government and the Government of the United States were to take a turn seriously threatening maintenance of peace between the two nations.

As far as lies with the German Government, it wishes to prevent things from taking such a course. The German Government, moreover, is prepared to do its utmost to confine operations of the war for the rest of its duration to the fighting forces of the belligerents, thereby also insuring freedom of the seas, a principle upon which the German Government believes, now as before, that it is in agreement with the Government of the United States.

The German Government, guided by this idea, notifies the Government of the United States that German naval forces have received the following order:

"In accordance with the general principles of visit and search and the destruction of merchant vessels recognized by international law, such vessels, both within and without the area declared a naval war zone, shall not be sunk without warning and without saving human lives, unless the ship attempt to escape or offer resistance."

But neutrals cannot expect that Germany, forced to fight for existence, shall, for the sake of neutral interests, restrict the use of an effective weapon if the enemy is permitted to continue to apply at will methods of warfare violating the rules of international law. Such a demand would be incompatible with the character of neutrality, and the German Government is convinced that the Government of the United States does not think of making such a demand knowing that the Government of the United States repeatedly declares that it is determined to restore the principle of freedom of the seas from whatever quarter it has been violated.

Accordingly, the German Government is confident that, in consequence of the new orders issued to the naval forces the Government of the United States will also now consider all impediments removed which may have been in the way of mutual cooperation toward restoration of the freedom of the seas during the war, as suggested in the note of July 23, 1915, and it does not doubt that the Government of the United States will now demand and insist that the British Government shall forthwith observe the rules of international law universally recognized before the war, as are laid down in the notes presented by the Government of the United States to the British Government, December 28, 1914, and November 1, 1915.

Should steps taken by the Government of the United States not attain the object it desires, to have the laws of humanity followed by all belligerent nations, the German Government would then be facing a new situation in which it must reserve to itself complete liberty of decision. The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to the American Ambassador assurances of highest consideration.

Fresh Vigor for the Weak and Anaemic

JUST budding into womanhood—but anæmic. You want so much to help, but how? That is the vexing question.

With every confidence that it will give her real help, you may put her on Sanatogen.

Sanatogen supplies to the pale and debilitated just the food for tissue and blood building—albumen; and just the element for revitalizing the nervous system—organic phosphorus. It feeds these elements in such perfect union that even the weakest constitution can digest and assimilate them.

As Prof. C. Von Noorden, of Vienna, the great medical authority, says:

"Sanatogen is especially valuable when the object is to promote tissue building, as in anaemia and malnutrition."

And Dr. Ferchmin, the Czar of Russia's Private Physician, writes:

"My daughter, who was very nervous and anaemic, has been greatly benefited by Sanatogen. Her appetite improved, her weight increased and the color of her skin became healthier."

Thousands of physicians—over 21,000 have written their approval of the use of Sanatogen—prescribe Sanatogen because they have seen how it improves the appetite, increases physical strength, enriches the blood current, tones up the system and does away with that feeling of weariness and lassitude.

When you have tried Sanatogen, you too will realize how helpful it is in bringing fresh vigor to the weak and anaemic.

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists, everywhere, in sizes from $1.00 up.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

MRS. L. C. W. writes from Plainfield, N. J.: "It is two weeks since I joined your Prayer League, asking prayer for my two brothers. It seems almost impossible that in so short a time I would see one of those brothers go up and acknowledge that he was going to stand for Christ, and so my prayer and yours of the Prayer League were answered. It was at this great revival that you are praying for. It would have done your heart good to see the number that took their stand for Christ. My heart was overflowing with happiness, for my brother had asked a man to come to the meeting, who was so profane, and he too, accepted our Lord. Pray for them both that they may have strength given them from on high." E. E. B. writes from Waynesboro, Pa.: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for a friend who was a confirmed drunkard. In February he was converted and expects to unite with the Church of the Brethren in Christ in two weeks. Please pray for God's keeping power over him all through his life."

A wife writes from Russell, Iowa: "I wish to write you in regard to a vow I made to God some years ago when my husband went insane. I made a vow to Almighty God that if he would heal my husband's mind I would let the world know it, and I can't think of any better way than to write to the good old Christian Herald. I also asked the Prayer League to pray for my daughter's eyesight. At the time it seemed as though she would go blind, but, thank God, her eyes have improved greatly, and my husband's mind healed entirely. I cannot praise God enough for his love and mercy. There is power in prayer, and your Prayer League has helped me so much. It has helped me to help others. We shall never know how much good the Christian Herald and Prayer League have done until we reach that happy land where we shall be like Christ."

Mrs. E. V. O'N., of Mineral Wells, Texas, writes: "Only a few weeks ago I wrote asking to become a member of the Prayer League. How thankful I am that I did so! I believe you have been praying for my husband and myself as I requested you to do, for our dear heavenly Father has already granted one important part of my request, and granted it in such a gracious way. First I felt the power of your prayers. My heart was so burdened, but my faith grew stronger, and as I thought of his words, 'What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.' I was given the blessed assurance that what I had asked for in two of the requests was already granted. Yesterday I prayed that we might have the blessing come to us that very day, and it came through a letter about eleven o'clock last night. Oh, how I do thank my heavenly father! And I thank you for praying for us."

A Daughter from Heath Spring, S. C., writes: "I am writing in acknowledgment of prayers answered, I believe, as I wrote begging prayer for restoration of health, and I am so much improved, and spiritually too. Am able to work some now for my home and for God's cause. Please continue to pray for me that I may be completely cured. May I beg the prayer of your dear band, the earnest prayers of each, for my father—a sincere Christian, who has done so much for the Lord's cause, but who is old, broken in health and in great distress."

Mrs. B. A., Amboy, Ind., writes: "I wish to ask your prayers for my niece, who is very ill and cannot recover unless God heals her. Do pray for her, also for the wife of an evangelist who has tuberculosis. The business man of whom I wrote last summer is now well and able to attend to business, as well as taking active part in church work. Surely God is able to do all we ask or think."

Mrs. J. W. B., of Lathrop, Mo., writes to ask prayer for two brothers that they may become consecrated Christians and that God may strengthen her husband spiritually. A Mother writes to ask prayer that her son and his wife may come back to God. She adds: "I gave my boy to God before he saw the light, in infant baptism, also saw him join the church. Now he has wandered away. When he was very sick as a boy, I asked God to save him for me—but for the glory of God only. Won't you please pray for his return to God? I also ask your prayers that my daughter will live nearer to God—that her husband may come to Christ, and that my daughter and son will become reconciled."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. B. A., Amboy, Ind.; Mrs. R. E. S., Sauquoit, N. Y.; Mrs. F. S. G., Spring Water, N. Y.; H. L. S., Ohio; Mrs. J. A. M., Little York, Ill.; Mrs. E. C., Canton, Ohio; G. A. P., Baton Rouge, La.; S. by means of these the missionary es and recrosses his parish; but often ng its tracks he rides from civili- n to carry the message of the Christ. id this great expanse of scenic n and beauty and wonder of rich- of rocks and land, there is a strong manly type of people. There is a e charm over this great land of si- but more than the fascination of eins of gold is the richness in the of its thousands of stalwart men, , courageous and self-sacrificing , and promising children who have to this country.

MR. JOSSELYN gives this little story to show how Sunday schools arted on the desert: "Early in my I stopped off at a little mining in the uplands, four thousand feet the sea. Children had been born raised there and had never at- d a religious service. It was even ed that the children were too wild into a Sunday school if there were A little bit of a woman with a big was found who said: 'I'll try.' came the children, boys and girls, and big, all dressed alike in blue lls. It was a little difficult to tell was which, and I said, 'Boys and would you like to come to Sunday ?' This was a new proposition hem, and they looked dubious. le is a universal reassurance, how- and they said, 'We'll come,' and vay.

"hen Sunday came they were all before me in the dance hall— was no other place to hold a meet- They were lined around the seats t the wall, but what a transforma- Instead of the blue overalls, the were in trousers and jackets, and rls had on stiff white dresses and primly in readiness for the strange We had a jolly Sunday school, t evening they all came again with der folks for a preaching service. came again and again, and a little stablished a service of their own.

To many of the isolated homes and lonely people of the desert the missionary and his wife come as the only connecting link to the religious life that the settlers enjoyed before coming to this land. Mr. Josselyn tells of his visit to an old couple living alone near Newberry: "One day the train left us standing by the tracks as it went off-country as the crow flies, getting smaller and smaller until at last a far-away curve took it from view. Then we looked around to see a pump house on one side and a section house on the other. Inquiry revealed the fact that some one interested in the Sunday school proposition lived two miles down the track. There we found a tiny little house with an old couple, seventy-three and seventy-four years of age, living in it.

"There is a certain pathos in old folks trying to tame the wild and rough elements of the desert. It is a job enough for the younger blood. When we would have gone farther for the night, they asked us to stay with them, and we spent the evening in singing together before the organ, reading the sacred page, and pouring out our hearts together at the throne of grace. Bedtime found us in the center of a room. In one corner was a stove, in another the dining-table. A third held a set of double harness, while the remaining corner served as storage for a gasoline engine. We slept serenely.

"In the morning the sun was rising over the desert as we went our way. The old lady, her gray hairs glorified by the morning sun and her step tottering a little, accompanied Mrs. Josselyn. When we climbed the steep side of the grade they halted in their little patch of plowed ground. The old man, his voice choking a little, said, 'Mother's heart was nigh to breakin' when you would have gone away last night. You can't understand what a visit like this means to us alone out here.'"

The warm breath of the Gospel has brought roses to blooming in the desert places, and in the wilderness have waters broken out.

Here the excavators nearthed a complete set of ruins. ying guides get tourists to swallow stories than in any place I know f. lere the towering columns of the le of the Sun watch the orb of day d behind the Lebanon, after the lifting shadows have engulfed the smaller temple of Bacchus. And the Sun, in departing, leaves his kiss upon the stately colonnade in a clearly seen tinge of red. There are prosaic folk who say that this is caused by iron in the rock. That may do as an explanation to those who believe in the age of iron, but this mighty temple does not belong to the present age of machinery.

It is more likely that the red tinge in the rock is the stain of blood—the blood of men who died in erecting this everlasting monument. Perhaps it is as well that the blood of the laborers should show on the monument of the conqueror who built this temple to an unknown god. Men who are killed in mines and dangerous occupations today have no such mighty reminders of their toil as the blush which shows on the graceful columns of Baalbek, when the setting sun slowly settles behind the long line of lofty Lebanon.

Wile at Sandusky he became pro- y interested in the condition of untry, and after a pastorate of ears accepted the secretaryship Ohio Home Missionary Society er to avail himself of the special es which the office would afford e study of the great home mis- y problem in all its aspects. g this secretaryship of three years led much to the materials which ard appeared in "Our Country." In 1 4 the attractions of the pastorate prevailed, and he accepted a call to the Vine Street Church of Cincinnati.

In 1886 "Our Country" appeared. "The New Era" was published in 1893. Early in 1898 appeared "The Twentieth Century City." Since then Dr. Strong issued "Expansion," "The Times and Young Men," "The Next Great Awakening," "Social Progress," "The Challenge of the City," "My Religion in Every Day Life," and "Our World."

In 1898 he organized the American Institute of Social Service, of which he was made president, remaining at the head of this organization until his death. In the summer of 1904 he was invited to England to aid in organizing the British Institute of Social Service, and at this writing organizations have been formed on the American plan in five European countries and in Australia.

and then, having found one, you'd write it in the Reply Book

Here, directly above, you see a page from "Gems from the Bible." The latter is a convenient little book containing all the possible answers, and in fact the only eligible answers, for the Bible Contest pictures.

At the top of the page, you see a specimen picture, a fitting text for which is found in "Gems from the Bible," and then entered in the Reply Book. That's the process of the Bible Picture Contest.

Here, directly above, you see the upper portion of a page from the Contest Reply Book, the rest of the page (which has been torn off) consisting of more blank lines. A Reply Book is given to you together with "Gems from the Bible."

MAKE NO MISTAKE!

$1,250 in cash is the first reward in the Bible Picture Contest. There will be 419 rewards in all, totaling $3,500. And a good deal of enjoyment is to be had by every contestant, from start to finish. The spiritual, material and recreational rewards which will accrue to every contestant will far outvalue and outlast any cash reward. If you haven't a copy of the rules, they will be sent to you (with all other needed information) on request. However, we shall here tell you some of the provisions.

The Contest consists of 60 pictures, for which you are to supply the most appropriate Bible verses. The pictures, if they have not been saved by you from previous issues of the Christian Herald, can be had from us at one cent each or as part of the Bible Picture outfit as explained in the special offers given below.

The Bible verses you select as answers for the pictures MUST BE VERSES INCLUDED IN THE STANDARD LIST, the references of which will be sent to anyone without charge. The actual verses are given for easy and convenient examination in "GEMS FROM THE BIBLE": but no other quotations will be accepted as answers.

The answers are to be submitted by writing each verse below a facsimile drawing of the corresponding picture, or else may simply be written (without the drawing) in the spaces of the Reply Book and that is all you need do. Set of answers (Reply Book) is to be sent in to the Christian Herald not before June 19th and not later than July 17th, 1916.

Merry Moments

MIRTH is like medicine to life:
It soothes its ills, it calms its strife;
It softly smoothes the brow of care,
And writes a thousand graces there.

ORIGINAL anecdotes, full of real fun, will be welcomed for this column, and only these will be paid for.

WHO WENT FOR THE FLOUR?—"I'll attend to you in a minute!' was the favorite remark of a certain mother to any of her children who were naughty: and the delinquent knew what this usually meant

One day she sent her four-year-old son to the grocer's for some flour. It was his first errand, and, much to his mother's surprise, he returned empty-handed

"Where s the flour?" she asked.

"—I didn't get it," replied the youngster. "The man frightened me."

"Nonsense; he won't hurt you!" admonished the parent sternly. "Go back at once and get the flour!"

But again the boy came back without it, and this time his eyes were full of tears.

"What's the matter?" asked the mother, anxiously.

"Boo-o-hoo-o!" wailed the child. "I'm afraid of that man. Every time I went in, he said, 'All right, sonny, I'll attend to you in a minute!'"

IMPORTANT KNOWLEDGE.—"How's your little boy getting along in school?" asks a friend.

"His standings in toothbrush drill," replied the mother, "and in breathing exercises is excellent, but he does not seem to make any progress in reading, writing, and arithmetic." —The Northwestern Lutheran.

ACCORDING TO THE FORMULA. A tramp knocked at a kitchen door and said, "Please, kind lady, I'm a sick man. The doctor gimme this medicine, but I need something to take it with.' The lady was ready to help. "Poor fellow!" she said, "do you want a spoon and a glass of water?" The tramp answered, "No, mum, I wouldn't trouble you. But this medicine haster be took before meals. Have you got a meal handy?"

SHE "KENNED."—A bashful young Scot called upon a girl for quite a while without finding courage to speak up. At length, one Sunday night, he said:

"Jane, do you ken I were here Monday night?"

"Aye."

"And ag'in Tuesday?"

"Aye."

"And I were here Wednesday and Thursday?"

"Aye."

"And once more on Friday and again last night?"

"So you were."

"And here I am tonight."

"Yes."

Finally, in desperation: "Woman, do you no smell a rat?"—Rural New Yorker.

BY ANOTHER'S WATCH.—Dr. Henry Van Dyke some years ago appeared before the Congressional Committee on Patents in Washington, when a long list of speakers were waiting. Thomas Nelson Page, who had been granted ten minutes, talked half an hour. It was then Dr. Van Dyke's turn.

"How much time do you need, doctor?" inquired the chairman.

"Ten minutes—by Mr. Page's watch," was the ready reply.—Lippincott's Magazine.

A CHANCE FOR THE CHAPLAIN—"Won't you be very, very happy when your sentence is over?" cheerfully asked a woman of a convict in prison.

"I dunno, ma'am, I dunno," gloomily answered the man.

"You don't know?" asked the woman amazed. "Why not?"

"I'm in for life."

HERE on a hillside, not far from the Sea of Galilee, is a little lad with five loaves and two small fishes, for which passers-by are bargaining. The man in the background looks as if he could eat them all. These are just such loaves as those might have been which the Lord divided among the five thousand by the Sea of Galilee, for manners and customs have changed little there. The fish which the Master broke to feed the multitude may have been dried and salted, but they were probably of the same species as these which the modern lad is offering to hungry men. It is not probable that Christian Herald readers would find this bread appetizing. It is somewhat lacking in leaven, somewhat tough in texture, and travelers tell us that it is marketed with little regard to cleanliness, each passer-by testing the loaves with his thumb and finger. The young man who is selling his wares from the vantage-point of our front cover appears to be clean.

Save the Babies

TANGLEFOOT

Catch the disease carrying fly that strays into your home with safe, efficient, non-poisonous TANGLEFOOT; not arsenic poison in an open saucer set within reach of the baby, or a can from which a poisoned wick protrudes, sweetened to attract both flies and babies.

Flies kill many babies, and fly poison more than all other poisons combined.

—But in homes where careful mothers have protected their babies from such risks by using only TANGLEFOOT, both dangers are avoided.

The Journal of the Michigan State Medical Society reports 26 cases of arsenical poisoning from fly destroyers in 1915 in only 11 states; in 1914 there were 46 cases in 14 states.

It states editorially:

"Symptoms of arsenical poisoning are very similar to those of cholera infantum; undoubtedly a number of cases of cholera infantum were really cases of arsenical poisoning, but death, if occurring, was attributed to cholera infantum.

"We repeat, arsenical fly destroying devices are dangerous and should be abolished. Health officials should become aroused to prevent further loss of life from their source. Our Michigan Legislature, this last session, passed a law regulating the sale of poisonous fly papers."

Attracting Birds About the Home

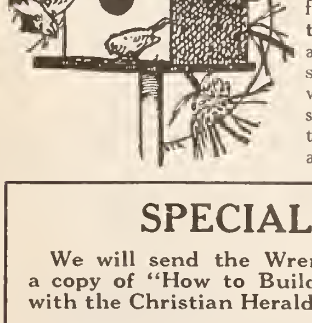
BIRDS may be kept about us all the year with ease and certainty, merely by offering what the birds want.

You want birds about on account of their beauty and song, and because of their economic worth as insect destroyers. They can be readily attracted by furnishing safe retreats in which they can rear their young comfortably. No attraction for summer birds is more effectual than a few houses suited to their needs and habits. The house wren, the bluebird, the tree swallow and the martin are sure to be attracted if offered a suitable house to live in.

We want to help readers of the Christian Herald to provide ways to attract birds about the home. We are arranging for a supply of bird houses at reasonable prices, further announcements of which will be made in future issues.

A Practical Wren House

This serviceable little house will attract and give proper protection to this most companionable little songster. Sides stained attractive oak color, top and base moss green.



"How to Build and Use Bird Houses"

This little booklet contains plain information about attracting, feeding and protecting birds, together with five full-size patterns of practical bird houses that can be readily made by anyone. There is a separate pattern (full size) of the different sections of each house. The pattern can be pasted lightly on the wood to be used for each section, then cut to the proper shape and size. The different sections will fit exactly, a few nails completing the construction. If bought ready-made, such houses would cost at least one dollar each.

SPECIAL BIRD HOUSE OFFER

We will send the Wren House illustrated here, prepaid, a copy of "How to Build and Use Bird Houses," together with the Christian Herald for one year, all for . . . . } $1 65

We will send this Wren House, postpaid, a copy of "How to Build and Use Bird Houses," to any present subscriber sending us $1.00 to pay for a subscription to the Christian Herald for eight months for a new subscriber . . . . } $1 00

Questions and Answers

K. S., California. Will you please discuss the subject of making men feel at home in the church? My experience in coming to a new town is that in most churches some one will speak to you, but that does not let you into the social life of the church. A young man comes to town and is desirous of meeting the right kind of people. He would like to call on some of them of an evening or a Sunday afternoon, as those times are very lonesome in a furnished room; but he is not made to feel that he would be welcome at a single home of the members. Now he does not have to go far to find a show, a billiard or pool room where he can easily find a companion to pass away an evening or afternoon with. I attended church three years in one place, five years in another, two years in another, part of the time attending Sunday school and other meetings, and while I came to know nearly everybody by name I never received an invitation to any member's home for a Sunday afternoon or an evening. Whenever anything was held to raise money I was always remembered and reminded of the time and place.

This letter, written in a kindly, uncomplaining spirit, is a severe arraignment of modern church life. Jesus was fond of the word "neighbor." He came to teach people how to be neighborly. When Christians fail to be good neighbors, when they fail to make strangers feel really at home, when they fail to turn strangers into genuine neighbors, they are failing to do one of the things that Jesus regarded as fundamental. It is sad to think of the thousands of young men whose experiences duplicate that of this young friend whose letter we quote. It is terrible to think of the temptations to which many have yielded, of the lives that have gone wrong instead of right, just because we have neglected to ask young men like him to come, not only to our churches, but to our homes. What are you and your church doing to hold and save the young men who come within your influence? Who can tell of some plans that have worked well? Let's have some more letters on this subject.

Mrs. N. A. S., Chino, Calif. Were any sacrifices offered in the temple after the veil was rent in twain at the time of Christ's death?

Doubtless this damage was repaired and the offering of sacrifices continued during the few remaining years until the complete destruction of the temple by the Roman armies under Titus, in A. D. 70. But the fact that sacrifices are no longer offered in the temple is one of the strongest arguments to present to Jews for the claims of Christianity. What better explanation of the cessation of Jewish sacrifices can be given than that offered in the New Testament, particularly by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews? Study Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy for answer to your second question.

Careful Reader. There are about 200,000,000 Mohammedans in the world, of which number about 45,000,000 are in Africa. The Moslems in Africa are conducting a strenuous missionary campaign among the heathen tribes of the interior to secure them for Islam before the Christian missionaries have converted them to Christ.

Mrs. A. M. A., Virginia. The 19th, 20th and 21st verses of Acts 3 have puzzled many readers. The "seasons of refreshing" are held to refer to the period of repose, prosperity and joy which the prophets foretold as to follow the national conversion of Israel. The times of "restitution of all things" are interpreted as meaning the rectification of all the disorders of the fall—which has been foreshadowed by those prophets who, like Isaiah, have depicted the coming "golden age." Scholars are not agreed whether these events are to be contemporaneous or successive. The passage in II Peter 3: 8 implies that God's apparent delays in the fulfilment of his promises are not to be reckoned like the delays of men. Human life is but a little span in the limitless ages of eternity, and to the divine mind an interval has no relation to the duration of time. God measures by ages, while we measure by hours.

M. B. O., Spartansburg, Va. All the blessings we enjoy in this life we owe to the goodness of God, and it is surely fitting that we should show our gratitude, not only in our prayers but by our gifts to the Lord's work. Any promise or pledge of this kind should be made, not in a moment of haste, but after due consideration, and then faithfully kept. Though, in the world's view of the atter, we may be under no legal obligation to this, there is a moral obligation which ca ot be overlooked. We are to keep our pro se as long as we are able, and even to mak sacrifices to do this. Should some unforsee event make it impossible for us to keep it— dis-aster or sickness—then the moral ob ation is lifted, as God does not demand of what we cannot accomplish. Further, we e no right to give the Lord's work anyth but a "clean sacrifice"—and this would ba man from devoting to that purpose the mo that lawfully belongs to his creditors.

Troubled, Adel, Iowa. In case a lik ours, you should not act on impulse, but t on God and follow his leading when he early opens the way. To act precipitately, you suggest, would bring sorrow and s ring upon innocent people.

L O. F., Gladys, Va. A portion the descendants of three great families of t tribe of Levi was set apart for certain office f the sanctuary. Those so chosen were t first-born males. At the beginning of the story of the "kingdom of priests," Levi l no special distinction above the other tri , but when it became apparent, later, t the Levites, perhaps more than others, rep nted purity of worship, and kept themselv from the pollution of idolatry when the pe e se up the golden calf, they began to be rec nized as "an Israel within an Israel." Fr that time onward, they occupied a distincti position and had a special consecration, a gradually they took the place of the olde iesthood.

J. B. C., North Carolina. Should a urch go outside of its membership t et a person who is not a member of th urch to take charge of the music, wh they have members who can and will the work?

So far as possible the music of the urch ought to be conducted and rendered sincere Christians. If an "outsider," h ever of pure character has unusual skill in sical matters, it is often advisable to take antage of his or her willingness to help. There is always a possibility that the helpful i ence of the church will lead such a helper the realities of the spiritual life. It is unfo nate that so many difficulties and contentic arise over the matter of church music Ve often the petty jealousies, the unkind wo and acts in choir circles do far more to hir the work of God than would the presence some one in the choir who is not a professin Christian. Often, too, some one promi en the church imagines that he or she possess great musical ability, when such is not the c and desires a responsible position not so n for the sake of helping the Lord's work as the added prominence such a position wo give The music committee must plan to m the music of the church as fine and he l as possible. Of course the ideal, happily ched in some churches, is that every choi nger should be an ardent Christian

Mrs. E. A. B. and others. Kindly st the principle of Socialism.

The fundamental principle of soci m is that the worker himself should get th ntire value of the commodity he produces. cialists hold that it is essentially unjust t the profits of one man's toil should go to her. They divide society into two distinct sses, the capitalist class and the laboring cl and claim that the capitalist class lives, la y in idleness, by means of unjust profits ived from the working class. Socialists not advocate "dividing up" the world's alth except in so far as they believe that l unes which have been accumulated by taki rom the labor its just rewards should go bac the workers. Socialism holds that all the ural resources, such as coal, fuel, timber, sh d be owned and controlled by the people as hole rather than by private individuals or orations. The Standard Dictionary fines socialism as "A theory of civil polity th aims to secure the reconstruction of soci increase of wealth, and a more equal distr tion of the products of labor through th blic collective ownership of land and pital (as distinguished from property), a the public collective management of all inc ries. Its motto is: "Every one according his deeds." Socialism, as claimed by it dvocates, is distinguished from commu in not demanding a community of g s of property, and from nationalism in not king that all individuals shall be rewarde like. Fabianism is a modified form of Sociali that aims to bring about similar results by tion industry under state ownership only fas as the state can be made ready to op e it —easily the supreme motor

THERE is just one easily supreme type of automobile motor.

And that's the sleeve-valve motor.

There's just one comparison which every other type must encounter.

And they all fall short when that inevitable comparison with the sleeve-valve motor is made.

Compared with the sleeve-valve motor—

Is any other type as quiet?

No; all other types have poppet valves, cams and springs, which are noisy and grow nosier, while the sleeve-valve motor grows quieter with use.

Is any other type as powerful?

No; size for size the sleeve valve type develops greater power—indisputable fact.

Is any other type as flexible?

No; cylinder for cylinder the sleeve-valve motor has greater range on direct drive—beyond possible doubt.

Does any other type improve with use?

No; they all lose in power and flexibility as carbon collects in the cylinders, while carbon improves the sleeve-valve motor and it gains in power and flexibility.

Is any other type so durable?

No; they all have to be overhauled repeatedly and finally can't "come back," while the sleeve-valve motor goes on improving for literally thousands of miles beyond the useful life of any other type.

Is any other type as economical?

No; the less expensive upkeep and much longer life make the sleeve-valve motor cost the least in the long run.

These are the facts which have made the sleeve-valve motor supreme abroad—which are making the sleeve-valve motor supreme in this country.

Questions and Answers

READER, Ohio. Do you really believe in answered prayer? I have been making a special request of God. The thing I ask is only a trifle. God could do it in a moment. It would do no one any harm and me much good, inasmuch as I would not only hope, but know and believe. As it is now I am conscious only of the emptiness of space. You see how it is. I felt that he did not care. So now I am trying to get used to going to sleep nights without my evening prayer. It seems such folly to babble into empty space like a pagan, or at least call for help where there is none to care. Please say something to me.

Suppose we go straight to the Bible for an answer. The Bible puts faith first. It does not tell us to ask God for things so that we may believe, but to believe first and then to act upon our faith by making our requests known. Jesus said: "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." The thing to do first is not to find answers to your prayer, but to find God. God is speaking to you all the time. All these feelings of loneliness and disappointment are calls from him, asking you to come and be his friend. He has something far greater for you than the little thing you were asking—himself. "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added." We certainly do believe in answers to special prayer. We have had them in our own lives, and every week brings to the office of the Christian Herald testimonies of many who are having like experiences. But read Paul's experience about the thorn in the flesh (II Cor. 12: 7–10), showing how he would rather have Christ's companionship than freedom from his trouble, whatever it was. And never forget the words of Christ's own prayer: "Not my will, but thine, be done" (Luke 22: 42).

M. D., Chamois, Mo., and Reader. Why did the Jews of the Old Testament not do mission work among the heathen nations of that time? How had the Jewish religion become known in Ethiopia, as it must have been from the fact that the Ethiopian eunuch who was converted by Philip had been to Jerusalem to worship, and was familiar with Isaiah?

The Old Testament Jews did do missionary work. See Sunday school lessons for April 16 on Peter and Cornelius in the Christian Herald of April 5, page 428. The work of proselytizing went on more enthusiastically after the Babylonian captivity. Jonah was a missionary to Nineveh. And Jesus spoke of the zeal of those intense Jews who "would compass the sea and land to make one proselyte" (Matt. 23: 15). It is not known when the first work was done in Ethiopia, but it is likely that the proselytizers had been there and that the eunuch was one of their converts, though it is possible, of course, that he may have come in contact with Judaism on some of his other travels. The Jews felt that there was no salvation outside of Judaism, but recognized that a Gentile could be saved by becoming a Jew. Despite the intense spiritual exclusiveness of the Jews, there are in the Old Testament surprising gleams of higher and broader ideals in regard to other nations. See Deut. 23: 7; Isa. 19: 18-25; Zech. 9: 7.

Mrs. Ruth A. Fox, Pasadena, Calif., sends this little verse of springtime cheer to the readers of The Mail-Bag:

The wheels of Time in their turning
Are saying to you and to me:
"Awake, be up and doing;
Now make ye the day glad and free;
Give roses to all who ask them,
Give roses to all who weep;
Bring flowers to the sick and fainting
Who stumble and fain would sleep.
For joy will come to your own heart,
And the year be bright all through,
If you do unto every other
As you would wish done to you."

Old Subscriber, Morrisville, Vt. An animal which rests upon its haunches, with forefeet extended, the head resting upon them, is said to "couch." It is the attitude of both wild and tame beasts. The lion "crouches" for a spring, and "couches" to devour his prey. The passage in Gen. 49: 9 represents Judah, the royal tribe, as first a lion's whelp not yet grown, or powerful enough to seek its own prey, then as an old lion, couched beside its prey, its hunger satisfied, calm and quiet, though still formidable and commanding the respect of other animals. "This," writes one commentator, "was the attitude of Judah in the days of David and Solomon, when the other tribes bowed before it, as if recognizing the preeminence of that branch of the nation from which afterward was to spring 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah.'"

A. W., Brooker, Fla. The subject is controversial and cannot be settled by discussion in the Mail-Bag.

R. R. B., Woodburn, Ia. There is no orthodox Christian denomination that teaches other than that Jesus was the Son of God. See Matt. 1: 20, 21 and Luke 3: 22. In these two chapters will be found the genealogy of Jesus in the Jewish form.

W. H. H., North Madison, Ind. The figure employed in Matt. 10:34 is explained in the next verse. The "sword" was the symbol of strife, discord, conflict, "deadly opposition between eternally hostile principles, which would penetrate into and rend asunder the dearest ties."

T. J. There are no Biblical injunctions applicable in the case you mention. The intermingling of the Oriental and Occidental races is regarded as inadvisable for reasons that have to do with the wide differences in social and economic views, in long-established custom, in morals and in inherited tendencies. These are wholly apart from the question of religion. In extreme cases, such unions are attended with so many obvious disadvantages that public opinion condemns them.

A. W., Brooker, Fla. See I Cor. 15 and related texts, including John 5: 24, 25; Eph. 2: 5; 1 John 5:12; Rom. 6:13; John 11: 11.

W. M. P., Martinsville, Va. The passage in John 10: 34 is one which has been eagerly debated by commentators. Some have held it to mean that the idea of a communication of the divine majesty to human nature was not foreign to the ecclesiastical thought of the Old Testament; but the contrast which Jesus indicated between himself and all merely human representatives of God—the One, divin ter- nal, sanctified by the Father and sent i the world, the other being one to whom th ord of God "merely came"—was too clea be misunderstood. One expositor remarks this point, "It is never said of Christ th 'the word of the Lord came unto him,' wher this is the common formula employed in an nc- ing the divine commission to prophe and spiritual leaders since the world bega ven the highest of them, like John the Ba st.' Read the passage in Ps. 86: 6, 7. I ces. rulers and judges were thus classed, eing mighty and revered, and regarded as pre- sentatives of the divine justice—in ther words, men with a commission which nse- crated and dignified their lives.

Puzzled, Grooville, N. Y. You ma ave misunderstood the preacher. See the age in Rev. 20: 5, 6. Why not ask him pers ally, calling his attention to the passage refe l to?

W. B. D., Berlin, Ont. Isa. 11: 10- has reference to the victorious restoration o srael and the ingathering of the "remnant rom different countries—from Assyria and yp from Pathros (Upper Egypt), from 'us (Ethiopia), from Elam (Southern Persi and Shinar (Mesopotamia, to which the v h extended), and Hamath (Northern Sy the nearest to the Holy Land).

J. W. B., Glenwood, Iowa, a war v ra writes to the Mail Bag: "In your an r C. F. H., Lucy, N. M., you say, ' th treaty of Paris, December 10, 18 th Spanish ceded the Philippine Islands th United States, which paid $20.000. f them.' For what reason is the bill fore Congress now to give the Philippines f do or self-government? Will not the ite States need these islands when our m han fleet comes to branch out to all the ci trade, after the Panama Canal is in u and the great trade of the future is open up Will it not need them in case we have a ar of any kind on our hands? We have n only given millions in money, but have spe nore millions in improvements and educatio We have given the blood of hundreds of o boys (my own boy was killed in battle th) to secure these islands to this governme In view of all this, to see our flag pulle own doesn't look right to an old soldier wl went through a dozen battles of the civil r to maintain that flag."

F. M. F., Gladstone, Mich. The wo has its own ways of doing things, but as fa s the Christian Church is concerned, we ca hink of no emergency that would justify i re- sorting to the dance as a means of raisin unds for anything related to the church's s itual work. We are aware that there are so who take a different view of the situation, a who plead for larger tolerance in amus ents. We think the pastor in question satis l his conscience in making a protest.

E. B. P., Hartford, Conn. It is ne sary at times for the faithful Gospel work o go "down to the depths" in the pursu e of his duty. Jesus told us to go out int "the highways and byways." We see hing wrong in the incident, as you explain i

J. E. S., Oelwein, Ia. Isa. 58: 13-1 deals with one of the special promises to th odly who observe the Sabbath in the s t of joyful reverence. To take it for o own pleasure is to rob the day of its spiritu har- acter and to treat with dishonor the vine injunction to keep it holy. Bishop A ews a distinguished commentator, writes this subject: "To keep the Sabbath in idle manner is the Sabbath of oxen and as ; to pass it in a jovial manner is the Sab h of the golden calf, when the people sat d n to eat and drink; to keep it in surfeiti and wantonness is the Sabbath of Satan, the evil's holiday." The promise is that tho who delight themselves in the Lord by ob ving his holy day "shall ride upon the hig laces of the earth"—that is, they shall be s reme in authority in the land, and hold the ts of dignity and influence. He will hono hose who honor him.

W. F. F., San José, Calif. The pas e in Mark 13: 32 has been the subject of so dis- cussion, for the reason that the word "the Son," are found in Mark alone and t in parallel passages elsewhere. Some h as- serted that the passage means that the vela- tion of the day and the hour of Christ's ming was not "among the things which Je had received to communicate." Other aut ities reject this, however, and hold that it eans that our Lord, as man, was ignorant con ning the time when the fulfilment of this pa ular prophecy should actually occur. In any ent. the essential point of the admonition that believers should be in spiritual readine and this is fully illustrated in verses 34-37.

Of Carranza's forces

THE National Guard is in motion. The militia of several states have been summoned to the service of the country. In the armories of many more there is preparation for active service. In all the rest of the states the members of the National Guard attend to their civic duties with an ear open to the call to arms. In several states recruiting stations have been opened to increase the National Guard. Forty-five hundred militiamen are encamped on the Mexican frontier. Whether all this shall resolve itself into a most interesting war drill, a sort of false alarm to give the National Guard an opportunity to show what it could do in a real emergency, or precedes a repetition of the scenes of fifty years ago, may be decided by the time this issue of the Christian Herald is off the presses.

The Mexican situation has not been cleared up by the dispatching of a punitive expedition after Villa and his bandits. Instead, it has daily become more complicated. With the practical abandonment of the chase of Villa and the withdrawal of the American force into the northern portion of Mexico, the original agreement between Washington and the de facto government of Mexico headed by General Carranza has come to an end in the opinion of the latter. "Then why remain in an inhospitable land? We did not invite you here, we did not even welcome you. We have merely endured you. Please go!" said he, in effect; and to speed the parting guests, a few of them were shot down—by some one. Somehow this seemed to make our American soldiers prefer to remain, and on this point swings the question of war or peace with Mexico.

THERE has been much getting together of military heads from both sides of the Rio Grande, and these conferences have gradually narrowed in proposals and counter-proposals down to these two: The American proposal is to keep our forces in the northern part of Mexico on police duty until all danger from raiders is past. The Mexican proposal is that the policing be done by soldiers of both countries, but on their respective sides of the border. The belief is current that Carranza is making all possible show of determination prior to a complete surrender to the American wish, in order to impress his countrymen, yet the danger of a genuine disagreement between the two governments is so real that on May 9 the President called to the service of the government the militia of three states, Texas, Arizona and New Mexico, and ordered some 4,000 additional regulars to the border. And, either formally or otherwise, the entire National Guard of the country was made aware that they might soon be called into the field.

That the diplomacy with which General Obregon has met the demands of General Scott may hide a belief on the part of the Mexican people that war with this country is desirable, is indicated by a recent editorial in a responsible newspaper in Mexico City, El Pueblo, which is regarded as an organ of the present government of that country. "Mexico," says the editorial, "is facing the tremendous danger of war," and "The nation ought to know the truth." The editorial admits the evil that has been wrought by "the stupid aggression of Villa and his bandits" and by "refugee Mexicans, in union with capitalists, Catholics and American adventurers, plotting to undo the work of the revolution"; but at the same time flatly objects to the methods the United States has adopted to counteract this evil. Repudiating any belief that either country wishes war with the other, that influential journal closes its editorial with these significant words: "And as for Mexico, while one Mexican stands, the ground which he covers will be his home, his religion, his honor."

WHEN Generals Obregon and Scott met on April 30 at Juarez and El Paso, it was felt that from this conference would come an agreement that would enable both nations to keep the peace as between themselves, while eliminating the brigandage which was a constant menace to the peace of both. We were considerably disquieted when it was first announced that General Obregon had requested, almost with the force of a demand, the withdrawal of the American forces from Mexico. The tension was materially lessened when General Obregon withdrew this demand and agreed with General Scott upon a plan of campaign by which the American troops would remain in Mexico policing the area in which they then were and cooperating in every possible way with the Carranza soldiers in the complete elimination of bandits of every degree, the American troops to be withdrawn within sixty days if possible, but only when the complete object of the expedition was attained in the capture of Villa and the dispersal of every band which he or any other outlaw might direct.

The country was greatly relieved when it was announced on May 4 that President Wilson had accepted the Obregon-Scott agreement, and still more relieved when it was announced on May 6 that Carranza had found the agreement satisfactory with the exception of a few minor points. This relief was fortified by the report of another battle with Villistas by troopers under Major Howze at Ojos Azules, in which forty-two bandits were killed and some sixty others wounded, with no American casualties. It seemed as if the Mexican situation were clearing up, but the clouds gathered again on May 7 with the announcement of the attack by Mexicans upon the settlements at Glenn Springs and Boquillas, Texas.

Many rumors of the organized assembling of bands of Carranzista soldiers in different parts of Mexico reach this country. Fear of new raids by Mexicans is prevalent along the border, and a genuine panic is reported, American families fleeing both from Mexico into the United States and from the border into interior parts. Bands of armed Mexicans have impudently crossed to the American side and showed themselves in force. As a result of the raid at Glenn Springs, a second punitive expedition, it is stated, has crossed into Mexico, headed by Major Langhorne with two troops of the Eighth Cavalry. Close to the scene of the trouble the air is full of talk of war, and the arrival of the militia, the coast and field artillery and regular infantry preparatory to their distribution along the border, has added to the tension.

General Pershing, who was between 150 and 200 miles south of the Mexican border, has concentrated his forces at Colonia Dublan, and his line of communications is established with Columbus. Vague reports telegraphed to various American papers have indicated that the 18,000 American troops in Mexico are practically surrounded by 35,000 Carranzista soldiers, and that the 11,000 along the

TEXT—Isa. 26:15, R. V. "Thou hast increased the nation, O Jehovah; thou art glorified; thou hast enlarged all the borders of the land."

GOD deals with us not only as individuals, but also as families. A great general of the Civil War, who left behind him a creditable political as well as military record, in the last moments of his life called his wife and children around him and said, "God has been good to us as a family. We have been specially favored. It has not been our merit but God's mercy." God setteth the solitary in families, and there is such a thing as household grace.

And God setteth families in nations. A group of families makes a tribe, and a group of tribes makes a nation. A state is only a family on a large scale, one household multiplied by many, and bound together in all its parts by ties of common interest, interdependent. Indeed, the whole human race is only a family of nations; some are "dissevered, discordant, belligerent"; some are lame and leprous; some are young and vigorous, some very young and colicky; and some are senile and debilitated, but one family all. And God deals with us as nations. He gives us national gifts, appoints national boundaries, imposes national responsibilities, reveals national laws, and administers national rewards and punishments. The God of nations lifts up one and casts down another, puts down the mighty from their seat and exalts them of low degree.

It is a form of atheism which assumes that God is related to men only as to individuals. The political philosophy which excludes God from society in its corporate and organized forms is not only secular but profane.

God has his purposes concerning governments. His purposes concerning the world are so comprehensive that they demand the instrumentality and agency of empires and races. When God would develop a monotheistic civilization he calls a man out of his father's country, westward across the deserts, and establishes him in new environments. Presently we find the children of Abraham in Egypt. The plan expands, a race is to be rescued, a nation organized. Israel is called out of Egypt. The night of escape from the slime-pits and the brick-kilns of Pharaoh was the birth-night of the Davidic empire. Moses was the agent of God in the establishment of a new social order. No less were Joshua, Samuel, David. Equally so have been others—Ezra, Nehemiah, Judas Maccabæus.

THERE are those who seem to think that with the dispersion of the Jews and with the founding of Christianity God stepped out of the field of political history, and left the government of nations henceforth to kings and chancellors, to emperors and councils, to parliaments and senates. Is it not God's world still? Attempt to read modern history and leave out God, and you find yourself in the fog.

The downfall of the Byzantine Empire made way for the Renaissance. The rise of the English Commonwealth was necessary to the development of Puritanism. It cost an English king his head, but the head of every English monarch since Charles's time has been better balanced. It was no blasphemy when Cromwell's "Roundheads" went into battle with the royalists singing psalms, their knees dusty from having knelt in prayer. Review the history of England for a thousand years, through revolutions and restorations, through rebellions and reformations, and see the slowly rising doctrine of the sovereignty of man, man's superiority to pope and bishop, to king and parliament. Review the history of Germany for seven hundred years since Conrad, the first Hohenzollern, rose above the level of his fellows in East Prussia; study the dominant characteristic of that family, the heads of which have risen from burgomaster to margrave, from margrave to prince, and from prince to kaiser. Remember it was a Hohenzollern margrave who befriended Luther; remember that before the Reformation swept England, the fires of religious liberty were burning brightly over all northern Germany; remember what it was in the German banner which drew beneath it an English knight such as Sir Philip Sidney and a Scandinavian warrior such as Gustavus Adolphus. Blind is the German philosopher who sees no God in English history. Blind is the English philosopher who sees no God in German history.

WE may not see God on blood-stained battlefields of history, but God is there. Do you say, "But can God be on both sides?" I reply, "He is not on both sides; neither is he on the side of the strongest battalions; but he is there, keeping watch above his own; and the nation, or the nations, that most clearly perceive the will of God, are the nations which ultimately he will lift up."

There seems to be a strange confusion of ideas and ideals now contending for the mastery in Europe. Democratic England in league with autocratic Russia! Protestant Germany in league with Catholic Austria! Atheistic France lamenting the ruins of a Christian cathedral! Barbarous tribes of Africa and pagan tribes of India comrades in arms with Christian Britons and in death struggle with Christian Germans! Only the eye and the mind of Omniscience can reduce such chaos to order. Perhaps this is the only way to clear the atmosphere of Europe of militarism. Perhaps France may find the faith she has lost, for before German artillery had ruined the Cathedral of Rheims France had repudiated the faith that built it. Perhaps the Romanoffs may have mercy on those millions of Jews in Russia who have cried to God daily and nightly for deliverance. Perhaps their day of redemption is drawing near. Perhaps, as the wealth of nations wastes, men may grow more covetous of spiritual treasures. At any rate, we do not violate in letter or in spirit the duty of neutrals when we say that whatever the issues of the European war may be, we can be sure of this: that at the end, when the representatives of the powers meet, in the midst of their councils One shall sit whose judgments are a mighty deep.

We have inevitably our prejudices and our preferences, our hopes and our desires with reference to the issues of this war. But it is not for us to sit in judgment upon nations each of which believes in its heart that, whatever may have been the direct occasion of the war, its future is now trembling in the balances. It is for us, however, to make sure that in our national life we keep faith with God. His providence has been our inheritance. In a peculiar sense we are a chosen people. God forbid that we should regard ou elves as the only chosen people! God forbid, als that we should forget the rock out of which we hav been hewn and the Hand that has directed the hew !

The discovery of America was one of thre great events in the same age, either of which alone ould have been sufficient to make it a providential och. Columbus, Luther, Gutenberg. Here is new continent. Here is an open Bible. Here the movable types to print it. It was as if the v e of God were heard across the waters saying, "Le here be room for mankind to grow; let there be edu tion, religion, liberty; let the blood of all nations ingle that the world may see a new man."

THE world has seen a new man, but he is t yet perfect. He confuses liberty with licens He does not yet see in large numbers the divine ss of the Pauline principle which reconciles huma ights and human responsibilities. (There is only on hing more important to a man than his rights, and at is his responsibility for the use of his rights.) When my liberty curtails the liberty of another, w n my rights infringe the rights of others, my libert ends, my rights must be renounced. There is a s se in which we are masters only of what we re nce. This is more than democracy; it is Christian mocracy. Mazzini once said, "Democracy witho God is hell." What he meant was that democracy nregulated by law, unguarded by love, unmodi l by social justice and mercy, is mere anarchy. the development of democracy is not yet ende The common man must be made not only free but werful. He must be made perfect. The weak mu grow strong, and the strong must grow childlike in derness. This is the mission of America in the orld. First it is the mission of America in Ame a, to make the common man perfect. And then, t make him universal.

To make the common man perfect and t make him universal—to this end were we born. education can do it, let us educate. If religion ca do it, let us support it. The school and the church, l ning and religion, are our most effective weapons. They are weapons only so far as they are effective, , let us say, efficient. So this is our task; to make ucation and religion efficient. Our schools are g wing in efficiency. The next ten years may see eater progress in solving the problems of efficient ed ation than we have seen in the century past. Th are signs of a revolution in education. And there i quite as much need for a revolution in religion. t in religious truths, but in the interpretation of hem. The religion of the future must not be less a igion of ideals than the religion of today, but it must nore a practical religion, personal, ethical, social, nply stated, broadly sympathetic and hopeful, ever hopeful for man and for men. Such a religi presages conquest.

In order that we may fit into the plan of d, to the end that America may fulfill her mission as od's great free agent through all the years of tim "till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grow man, unto the measure of the stature of the ful s of Christ," we need to humble ourselves befor God, and to submit ourselves to his guidance. H lone can increase the nation and enlarge all the ders of the land.

PREPARED!

By Katherine V. Smith

HASTEN, nation! God doth need thee,
He shall lead thee. Speed thy feet!
He hath led thee, sped thee, fed thee
With the finest of the wheat.

Thou art ready. Be but steady
To thy faith of Pilgrim days.
Thou hast grown through years of chastening
Strong to lead in freedom's ways.

Europe's needy, by thy beacon,
Found their Plymouth in thy land.
Flood and earthquake, fire and famine
Feel thy ever-generous hand.

Mid thy gifts, O world-protector,
Let my altar-flame now soar;
Plead my will, thou world-director,
From thy peace-defended shore!

Nation peerless, free and fearless,
Dare to summon war to cease!
Celt and Goth and Slav and Latin
Shall obey thy call to peace.

O'er these people, blind and stumbling,
Blow fresh breath of life again!
Lift the banner of my kingdom:
Peace on earth, good will to men!

These Laid the World Away

SUNDAY, May 28. Phil. 3:7. "These have I counted loss for Christ." Nothing counted to the apostle Paul but Christ and his kingdom. In the other scale, nothing was of any appreci- abl weight. He put into the balance some of the thi which are most fiercely coveted and treasured by t world, but they were lighter than vanity. The clai of long descent, the pride of ecclesiastical priv ge, the hope of worldly preferment, all that bel gs to condition and rank were firmly laid aside, as worthy to be reckoned or named. And in all this he apostle was like his Master. For He, too, had een shown the kingdoms of the world and the glo of them, and he had waved them aside as having no npting value to one whose soul is set upon spir- itu goals. The Lord Jesus would not "bow down and orship" the world, however many and glittering wer its offered crowns. "All these things . . . if Th" He rejected the impious bargain.

T reality and intimacy of our fellowship with Chi can be judged by our power to lay the world awa The world is presented to us in many different for . Sometimes it is just a fine, alluring road, with an en way to brilliant social triumphs, and all we hav to do is to make a moral compromise and we are in ssession of both the road and its goal. Some- tim the world approaches us in the form of ease; sor imes in leisured circumstances; sometimes in hoa ed traditions; sometimes in the public display of own griefs. And God's call comes to us in a com and to leave them, to shake our feet free from all heir toils, and to step out on roads which see to bristle with menace and hardship. "And the left all and followed Him." That is the spirit of nunciation; rather say, that is the spirit of infi e gain.

T lay the world away is sometimes like shedding a l nge coat. Sometimes it seems like throwing aw a warm garment on a winter day. Sometimes it pears like tearing away our skin. The measure of difficulty is the measure of our conquest. And the easure of our conquest is the measure of the force we ntribute to the army of the Lord. And the me ure of our contribution is just the measure of our apacity for entering into the joy of our Lord. We ave laid the world away; we have entered into the heritance of the saints in light. J. Jesus Our Deliverer

MONDAY, May 29. Joshua 3:9-17. "The priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of Jo n . . . and all Israel passed over on dry ground." Wh a vision this affords of the interposition of our gre High Priest between us and the waters of death an judgment. We can readily imagine the scene. Th hurrying waters of the swift-flowing Jordan are po ng down to the bed of the Dead Sea, and appar- ent making an impassable barrier to the passage of the congregation, whose march was encumbered by wo en and children, by the aged and the infirm, to say othing of vast droves of cattle and flocks of sheep.

t as the feet of the priests enter the margin of the flo s, it seems as though a sudden spell arrests them, an hey begin to pile up in an ever-augmenting heap. Ri t up the stream that arrest was felt, and the cha nel was choked as far as the city Zaretan. If the res ining hand had been for an instant withdrawn, the accumulated force of the arrested floods would ha swept the entire host of Israel and their posses- sio down to the Sea of Death. There was no fear, ho ver, that the devastating floods would be re- lea d from the restraining barrier that held them ba . The ark of the covenant, the presence of the pri ts, the promise of the Lord, guaranteed a perma- ne deliverance.

it is that faith perceives the Lord Jesus standing be een the soul and the floods of ungodly men. be een the sinner and the results of his sin, between the hild of God and all that would harm him. You ca ot see the august presence of Jesus, but he is cer inly there; and if he is for us, who can be against us?

Striving Daily Toward Excellence

TUESDAY, May 30. Matt. 5:48. "Be ye therefore perfect." This used to be a hard say- ing or us. Perfection is such a vast thing; it seemed so far away, so impossible; it discouraged us in the midst of weakness and mistakes.

But we have come to believe that perfection lies at the top of a ladder that has many rungs, and we climb that ladder one step at a time.

A part of perfection is the ambition to excel in our work. It matters not what our task is. The element of excellence may exist for the farmer who makes a perfectly cultivated field as truly as for the artist who makes a perfect Venus de Milo.

I think of a woman who can come as near making a perfect apple pie as any one I ever knew. She has a peculiar glory in it, too. That act is a part of her perfection—it is one rung in her ladder.

Some one has said that he had the ambition to overcome each year one of his besetting sins. Each year is a rung in his ladder.

These steps upward toward perfectness are many, and they are often difficult for different people. The important thing is to keep the attention fixed on the next higher rung of the ladder and keep climbing.

You remember how we used to read in the old readers in school of the boy who climbed to the top of the Great Natural Bridge in Virginia by cutting with his knife niches for his hands and feet, while his parents and friends stood below and kept shouting, "Keep your eyes on the top! Don't look down!"

Then, just as his head reached the top of the bridge, his knife dropped from his nerveless fingers, but he felt from above the warm arms of his father lifting him to safety. Likewise, in our climbing upward, God awaits us at every step. His arms are strong. Our perfection is his business as well as ours. Don't forget that. C. S. C.

Heirs to the Whole Land of Promise

WEDNESDAY, May 31. Joshua 1:1-9. "Arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto the land which I do give them." We have no hesitation in finding our Lord in this chapter. Heb. 3 and 4 place this beyond doubt, and the comparison, or contrast, is full of help and inspiration. In the earlier stages of the religious life, we are for the most part under Moses, and set ourselves with laborious care to fulfil the requirements of the law and of conscience. Luther, Bunyan, John Wesley, and myriads besides, have trodden this road. The latter, for instance, tells us that in 1729 he resolved to alter his life. He rose at four o'clock for prayer, spent an hour a day in retirement, took the Holy Supper once a week, and rigorously kept himself from evil in act and speech. But it was not till 1738 that he suddenly realized the saving grace of Christ.

But after a time Moses, the servant of the Lord, is left behind as we travel forward in Christian experience; and we find ourselves on the frontier of a new experience. Joshua, who stands for Jehovah our Saviour, awaits us, and by faith in him we cross the Jordan of death and enter the land of rest and peace, which is the inheritance of those who absolutely trust him. When shall we understand that God has given us all things in Christ? We are heirs to the whole land of promise, with its mountains of vision and valleys of green pastures and gently flowing streams. But to reach it we must go over this Jordan, which stands for death, for the cross, for the forsaking of our own life that we may become partakers of the life which is life indeed.

You have seen the cross outside you; have you found it within? You have died to your old evil habits; have you renounced yourself? Is the old man crucified with Christ? Only so can the land of promise become your own. F. B. M.

The Wonderful Book of Life

THURSDAY, June 1. Ps. 90:9. "We spend our years as a tale that is told." We frequently hear people say: "My life is just filled up with a lot of petty tasks, and an infinite number of details. I wish I had some one great thing to do. If I only had time to read or to write books!"

But life itself is one great book—one great story—and we are all each day turning its leaves. After all, we would get tired of reading only cold, printed pages. The world is the great book of life, and the people and the things we meet are its pages. Every detail, even the changing tasks, become fascinating when we think of them as our tale of life which we are telling day by day. The variety of our acts is our safety, even if most of us spend our years in turning small pages.

What kind of tale is my life to be when it is all told?

The great French critic Sainte-Beuve gave us a suggestive hint in a great passage: "I have arrived," he says, "at a deeper feeling of the principle that, whatever I do or do not, working in the study at continuous labor, scattering myself in articles, spreading myself about in society, giving my time away to troublesome callers, to poor people, in the street, no matter to whom or to what, I cease not to do one and the same thing, to read one and the same book, the infinite book of the world and of life, that no one ever finishes, in which the wisest read farthest. I read it then at all the pages which present themselves, in broken fragments, backward, what matters it? I never cease going on. The greater the medley, the more frequent the interruption, the more I get on with this book, in which one is never beyond the middle; but the profit is to have had it open before one at all sorts of different pages." C. S. C.

Getting the Broader Vision

FRIDAY, June 2. I Kings 10:1-24. "All the earth sought the presence of Solomon, to hear his wisdom which God had put into his heart." Among the rest came the Queen of Sheba with her hard questions; and Solomon told her all her questions; there was not anything hid from the king which he told her not. In many respects, we cannot compare our Lord with Solomon. "A greater than Solomon is here." But in this particular there is a suggestion of the wonderful faculty of our Lord to answer those difficulties which are perpetually testing our faith.

We have no right to turn cowards before the hard questions that are perpetually suggested by the mysteries of Providence, the prosperity of the wicked, or the statements of Scripture. He who gave us reason and says, "Come, let us reason together," cannot find fault if we honestly use that great faculty. We must never forget, however, that at the best we see through a glass darkly, and can only know in part. Our viewpoint is restricted, our information is fragmentary, our minds are immature, as are those of children when approaching grave issues. Some day we shall cease to be children, and shall put away childish things. The fact, therefore, of our not perceiving the answers to our hard questions does not prove that there is no answer, but only that we have not discovered it.

It is a wonderful experience, however, that when we honestly and humbly bring our difficulties to our Lord, and entrust them to his keeping, they get answered. Sometimes a sermon, a remark, or a passage in a book seems to chance on us, and clears up the perplexity of years. But, more often, there is an intuition borne in on our heart. Jesus is made unto us wisdom. The Spirit reveals things that the mind of man could not perceive. We reach an eminence in Christian experience which resembles mountain-climbing, where one last step at the end of a long ascent suddenly puts us in possession of a wide domain, and gives us our bearings. F. B. M.

The Pattern of the Divine Master

SATURDAY, June 3. John 4:38. "Other men labored and ye are entered into their labors." In Eastern countries, the tapestry weavers ofttimes are unable to complete the extensive pieces of workmanship during their lifetime, but as one dies another picks up the thread and weaves on according to the original design. Is it not so with the lives of evangelists, missionaries and ministers? They have labored and others have entered into their labors. "One soweth and another reapeth." How beautiful the thought that all Christians are working together in the construction of character, that, like a vast mosaic, will adorn the walls of the gallery of heaven!

We pick up the threads another has dropped and weave on after the beautiful pattern of the divine Designer, weaving in the Rose of Sharon, Christ the Redeemer and the Lily of the Valley, Christ the Resurrection; weaving in the dark background of suffering that the flowers and figures of self-sacrifice may become more brilliant. The weavers of tapestry work on the dull, wrong side, and often never behold the completed masterpiece. So many weavers of character see only the somber, afflictive, uninteresting side of their life's toil. The beautiful coloring, the artistic form, the perfect picture, will stand forth to greet the eyes of the multitude on examination day, when we shall be like him and see as we are seen.

A Week in the World's News

FOR BIBLE STUDY IN THE SCHOOLS. At the meeting in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the American Bible Society at Carnegie Hall, N. Y., on the evening of May 9, Rev. Dr. Arthur Taylor, Secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, uttered the keynote in a statement that "today the whole world needs the Bible." Rev. Edward Colville Moore of Harvard University declared that the influence of the Bible spread to every corner of the universe through the medium of translation would be the force by which nations of the world would recover from the debauch of war. Professor Moore stated that he had collected for the university library at Harvard translations in 375 languages and dialects, but that there were as many more to be added to his library. Francis Lynde Stetson deplored the tendency to bar the Scriptures from the public school curriculums. He suggested that a compilation of certain parts of the Old Testament might be used in the public schools without offending any denomination. Mr. Stetson said. "While we recognize that it is no part of the duty of the state to force upon the youth the acceptance of religious tenets contrary to their traditional faith, the state that denies to its children the opportunity of drinking from the deep wells of spiritual truth, found, as nowhere else, in the Holy Scriptures, leaves the soul of its people to die of thirst."

MUNITION PLANT EXPLOSION KILLS FIVE. On May 9 an explosion of 4,000 pounds of dynamite and nitroglycerine at the plant of the Atlas Powder Company, Lake Hopatcong, N. J., shook the country for forty miles around, killing five men and injuring fifteen. The explosion was started by the detonation of 500 pounds of dynamite in the dynamite mixing house. This was followed almost instantly by an explosion of the contents of the gelatine mixing house and by the explosion of the nitroglycerine storehouse. The storehouse held 3,000 pounds of dynamite.

WHEN OFFICIALS BREAK THE LAW. Some five years ago Postoffice Inspectors assisted by local policemen, without any warrant or other legal authority for their action, broke into the office of Jared Flagg of New York, whom they suspected of fraudulent use of the mails, and seized all of his books and papers. Flagg was later indicted and convicted on the evidence thus seized. On May 9, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the judgment of conviction because the raid upon his office had been in violation of the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution of the United States.

GENERAL STRIKE IN SPAIN. Employees of the Spanish railroads voted a general strike on May 8. The government immediately took steps to prevent a paralysis of traffic.

A HIGHWAY FOR PEACEFUL COMMERCE. On May 7 a canal under the mountains, connecting the port of Marseilles, France, with the River Rhone, was officially opened. The canal runs for five miles in a tunnel under the mountains that wall in the port of Marseilles and separate it from the rest of France, and will make possible the transportation of merchandise by water from the North Sea to the Mediterranean.

UNCLE SAM, RECEIVER. It is expected that the treaty with Haiti, by which the United States practically becomes the receiver of the Haitian republic, will be cormally proclaimed before the end of May. Under the treaty, officers of the American navy supervise the collection of customs and turn over to the Haitian government only such money as is actually needed in the administration of public affairs and the construction of public works, which are themselves supervised by officers of the navy. The treaty is being enforced by a sufficient number of American marines, but a constabulary force of natives is being trained to replace the marines. The arrangement is somewhat similar to that with Santo Domingo. The incipient revolution in Santo Domingo, noticed in last week's Christian Herald, was well in hand at last reports. Hostilities which broke out on the 6th, as a result of the attempt to overthrow President Jimenez, resulted in several persons being killed and wounded within the city of Santo Domingo. The disturbance did not extend to the republic outside of the city. The American minister stopped hostilities by issuing a warning that unless they were suspended within seventy-two hours armed intervention would result. On the same day, May 6, American marines dispersed a meeting of the Haitian Senate, which had refused to take action on a new constitution to conform with the treaty. Although the action of the marines was in support of the position of the Haitian cabinet, the cabinet resigned and sent a protest to Washington.

LORIMER "NOT GUILTY." A jury in Cook County, Ill., on May 4 found William Lorimer, ex-senator and former Republican political leader of the state of Illinois, not guilty on a charge of conspiracy to wreck the La Salle Street Trust and Savings Bank, of which he was president. The jury found that Mr. Lorimer had had no knowledge of the violations of the law, for which another officer of the bank has been convicted. Mr. Lorimer announced that he would again seek a seat in the Senate. He also expressed an intention to repay every dollar lost by the failure of the bank.

COAL TO COST MORE. Because of a recent wage increase, which will bring the miners $10,000,000 within the coming year, and of other increased expenses in production, it was announced on May 6 that hard coal will be advanced at least seventeen cents a ton at the mines. The announcement resulted in a decision of the Administration to prepare for an investigation of the coal trade to insure that there will be no raising of prices by combination above such advances as may be made necessary by the higher costs. It is claimed that after the increase in wages in 1912 the price was increased by an amount which netted about $12,000,000 annually to coal operators in extra profits.

AN INTERESTING RATE APPLICATION. At the first opening of the Panama Canal, transcontinental railway rates were readjusted to meet the new competition of the shortened all-water route from coast to coast. With the canal reopened, it appears that most of the traffic which it might have accommodated has now been diverted by more profitable rates in other fields, and the rate from coast to coast on such vessels as are still in the traffic now exceeds transcontinental rates by rail. The cities between Denver and the coast range are now engaged before the Interstate Commerce Commission in an effort to have the transcontinental rate raised to a point which will make it equitable in comparison with the rates charged from the Atlantic seaboard to the cities in this intermountain territory. The general rule under which the Interstate Commerce Commiss is authorized to fix rates provide that long distance rates shall excee the rates for shorter hauls. Permissi was given to adjust the transconti ntal rates to meet water competition, hich has resulted in the cities on the w tern coast paying freight rates 25 to per cent. below the rates paid by ei s in the mountains, which did not ave access to tidewater.

SOUTH AMERICA WELCOMES UR TRADE. On the return of the I rnational High Commission from uth America, Secretary of the Tr sury McAdoo reported that the Am ican delegates had been received every here in South America with the g test cordiality and that they had had ost instructive and interesting trip. cretary McAdoo said that he had fou the presidents of the various South Am ican countries earnestly desiring to strengthen the commercial, fi cial and political relations with the ited States. The conference, in meeting with Pan-American financiers, consider the creation of a uniform gold standa and increased banking facilities. Su tantial progress was also made t ard securing uniformity in the p ent, trade-mark, and copyright laws.

THE WORK OF CONGRESS. presentative Keeting of Colorado on ay 3 offered a resolution directing Sec ary McAdoo to show whether or not 20,000,000 is being annually withhel rom the treasury through income tax uds and evasions. Representative K ing said that Basil M. Manly, chief i stigator of the Industrial Relations ommission, had declared in public atements that $401,250,000 shou be received annually from the incom tax; $80,190,000 was actually collect last year. Manly claims that of $1 00,000,000 paid in wages and salar s in 1914, $500,000,000 was in s ries above $3,000; that more than $30 00,000 a year above the exemption l it is received as income from fees; hat $20,000,000,000 is received as i ome from ownership of property and c luct of business above the legal exem ion. The incomes subject to the tax otal $20,866,000,000, with legal dedu ons, net $14,525,000,000. On May the Hollis Farm Loan Bill was passed the Senate. The bill creates a ch of farm loan banks organized as oan associations. Each bank will h e a capital stock of at least $500,000, be subscribed by the government not taken by the public. Borrowers l be required to take stock in the assoc ion equal to five per cent. of their ns. All profits will go to the loan assoc ion in dividends and thus return t the borrowers. Loans may be made as long terms as thirty-six years and the amortization plan. Loans are limi l to first mortgages not in excess of fty per cent. of the appraised value the land. A similar bill is pending i the House. On May 9 the Administra on's revised Shipping Bill was report to the House. The bill will provi for from 500,000 to 700,000 tons of erchant shipping to serve our foreign de. On May 8 the House, to which ad been referred the agreement in onference on the Senate provision r a larger army, 180,000 men at ace strength, 220,000 in time of d ger, refused to concur by a vote of 2 to 142, standing by its own bill for a ace strength of 140,000, which is 000 more than the present war stre th. The House also refused to accep the Senate's nitrate plant amendment y a vote of 251 to 209, substituting it an amendment offered by Chairma ay to meet the charge that the S ate provision would benefit the " ter power lobby." Under the Hay a ndment, the plant would be operated clusively by the government. The S ate me ure provided for private operation unc an option of purchase by the Go rnment. After the vote in the Ho e, the Senate and the House con rees were reported near an agreeme, the House conferees accepting the Senate provision for the larger arn, the Senate surrendering its provis i for a volunteer army reserve of 261 00 men, which was opposed by the Na onal Guard interests as undermining the ational Guard, and strengthening the provision for civilian training car s. It was expected that the Senate wo l accept the House amendment on the itrate plant. Senator Kenyon of Io attacked the River and Harbor Bil in the Senate on May 9. The Ser e committee had reported the bill wit total appropriations of $42,000,000, mo than half of which Senator Kenyon cla ed would be money wasted. In the ast session Senator Burton of Ohio tal d the River and Harbor Bill to dea in a historic filibuster, and it is pr able that the present measure, un s radically changed, will meet a sin ar fate.

HAMPION WASTERS OF THE WORLD. In ddressing the Senate recently, Se tor Smoot of Utah said: "The An rican garbage can is the fattest in all he world." He took the ground th military readiness is not the sole ne ssary consideration, but that the de lopment of home economics is a vit phase of preparedness both for pe e and war. It is claimed that A rica is paying a quarter of a million ye y for the support of dependent wa earners; that of 3,000,000 widows ov 65 years of age one-third lack the ne ssities of life and 90 per cent. the co orts. Our garbage can is said ac ally to contain enough nourishing fo to feed all of France, and, besides wh we thus throw away, the amount th we spend uselessly and foolishly ru to even larger totals. America's fie s have been prodigal with her sons, bu with her increasing population, co ensing as it is in cities and in the ma ufacturing centers, the lesson of re thrift is the one lesson that will sa us from serious famine and distr in coming years.

HE CALL OF THE HOMESTEAD. R nt bulletins of the Department of th Interior give notice of the opening to ettlement of large areas of public la s. In the Colville Indian Reservatic in Washington, about 1,300,000 ac s have been thrown open to settlem t, of which, after Indian allotments ha been deducted, some 350,000 ac s will become subject to homestead en y. Information may be obtained fr Spokane or Waterville land offices up remittance of twenty-five cents by post office money order, payable to he receiver of the land office. In N Mexico 1,300,000 acres of land ha also been designated for entry in 320-acre homesteads, and similar ar s have been designated in other pa s of the country. Information rega ing the New Mexico homesteads m be obtained from the land officers at Las Cruces, Roswell and Santa Fe, New Mexico.

MEDIATION SETTLES STRIKES. The threatened strike of telegraphers of the New York Central and allied lines has been called off and the issue submitted to mediation through the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation. Strikers of the cloak and suit trade in New York have also been returning to work as individual manufacturers have come to terms with their employees. A strike of the men's clothing workers which would have involved 65,000 members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union of America was prevented through the mediation of Mr. Charles L. Bernheimer of the Arbitration Committee of the New York City Chamber of Commerce. A majority of the larger shops of New York manufacturing women's clothing are still closed at this writing, with both the Clothing Manufacturers' Association and the union adhering firmly to their original positions, the clothing manufacturers having refused to enter conferences aiming at mediation. A strike of 1,500 men in Perth Amboy, N. J., at the Standard Underground Cable Company's plant was followed the next day by increases in wages of more than 6,000 men in other plants. The 1,500 were still on strike at last reports. The strike of the 15,000 men of the Westinghouse Company in Pittsburg has been settled and the men are returning to work.

New Haven, Conn., April 22, 1916.

Sir—

I submit for your earnest consideration a copy of an official announcement of the American Red Cross. It states that the British Government refuses to pass Red Cross supplies hereafter from America to the Central Powers and indicates that the American Government has submitted to this decision without protest or publicity.

This, as you will recognize, is a nullification of the Geneva Convention. It strikes at the foundation of those principles of humanity in warfare of which the Red Cross has been the bulwark and for which the President now stands before the world as spokesman.

I wish to enter an earnest protest against an acquiescence by the American Red Cross in the action of the British Government and also against the policy of the American Government in concealing such important matters from the general public. I would lodge this protest particularly, because at this critical time allegations of inhumanity against the opponents of Great Britain are the basis of an ultimatum of which the natural outcome is war and for which the support of public opinion is sought.

As an active worker for the Red Cross I urge, therefore, that this matter be given immediate reconsideration by the Central Committee and that the public be authoritatively informed of what has been done in order that public opinion may assert itself.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) IDA HARRISON
for the New Haven Sewing Circles.

American Red Cross Official Announcement

The American Red Cross has received notification through the State Department of the decision of the British Government that Red Cross supplies destined to enemy countries will not be passed through the blockade established by the Entente allies. An exception is made of supplies intended for the use of hospital units maintained by the American Red Cross in these countries, but as these have been all withdrawn, the prohibition is in fact absolute.

In view of this fact, not only is the further contribution of supplies to the Teutonic allies not practicable, but it becomes necessary to make other distribution of those now on hand at the Receiving and Shipping Station of the American Red Cross, Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y.

It is proposed to ship these supplies, or such of them as may be appropriate for the purpose, to Siberia, to be distributed to German, Austro-Hungarian and Turkish prisoners in the prison camps of that country. It is therefore requested that you authorize the Red Cross to make this disposition of them; or, if for any reason this becomes impossible, to use these supplies for military preparedness at home, or for relief work in disasters in neutral countries. If neither of these dispositions is acceptable, please authorize their shipment, at your expense, to such address in this country as you may indicate.

Please sign the authority given below and return to the Receiving and Shipping Station, American Red Cross, Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y., in the enclosed envelope. Very respectfully, (Signed) J. R. KEAN.

Colonel Medical Corps, U. S. Army
Director General of Military Relief.

WIRELESS TELEPHONE IN THE NAVY. On May 6 a practical test was made of the wireless telephone in the American navy. Secretary Daniels talked from his desk in the Navy Department to the commander of the battleship New Hampshire at Hampton Roads.

CHEATING THE CLOCK. A movement which had its inception in Germany for an additional hour of daylight, to be gained by the simple process of setting the clocks ahead one hour, is spreading to Scandinavia and Great Britain, and threatens to be taken up seriously in America. If adopted, it will bring the cock-crow one hour closer to breakfast time, and will leave an hour of daylight for recreation after the evening meal. The city of Cleveland has already adopted the scheme by changing from Central to Eastern Time.

PHILIPPINE PROSPERITY. A compilation by the National City Bank of New York shows that in the sixteen years since 1898, in which the Philippine Islands have been under American control, exports from the United States to the Islands have aggregated $201,000,000 against a little more than $2,000,000 in the preceding sixteen years, the exports of 1914 being $27,000,000. Imports to the United States from the islands increased from an average of $5,000,000 per annum to an average of $25,000,000. Following annexation by the United States, the Philippine Islands showed a big increase in exports to all the world, the total in 1899 being $14,847,000, and in 1914 $48,690,000; total imports in 1899, $19,093,000; 1914, $48,589,000; showing a trade balance in favor of the Islands of about $100,000.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE military executions for participation in the late revolt continued in Ireland during the past week, and now a grand total of sixteen shot by order of the military courts has been attained. Considerable feeling of one kind or another has been aroused by the discovery that three persons, including F. S. Skeffington, editor of the Irish Citizen, had been executed in Portebello barracks, Dublin, without the knowledge of the military authorities and before martial law was in force.

This and other causes have determined the British government to appoint a commission, headed by Lord Hardinge, to investigate Irish affairs generally; Sir Roger Casement's trial was postponed to begin on Monday, May 15. All told, so far, seventy-nine persons have been tried in connection with the Irish trouble, and besides the sixteen executed, four received life imprisonment, twenty-one ten years penal servitude, and forty-two lesser terms. The government announced that the total casualties among the troops and police aggregate [illegible], of whom 124 were killed, including seventeen army officers. Another echo of the rebellion was the resignation of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Wimborne.

The Turks report that they captured at Kut-el-Amara, when the British surrendered, some forty cannon and twenty machine guns, in serviceable condition. In addition, 5,000 rifles were also taken, slightly damaged, which can be repaired. The British threw other arms, etc., into the Tigris, which the Turks are now engaged in fishing out. It is also announced that General Townshend and his brother officers have arrived at Bagdad, whence they will be forwarded to Constantinople.

Great Britain has ordered all married Englishmen living abroad, eligible for military service, to return to England forthwith and report for duty. The Canadian troops, aggregating 14,000, which left Halifax for Great Britain in the last days of April, are reported to have arrived safely.

The Belgians who are invading German East Africa from the west report having captured the German position at Shangugu, on the border of that colony and the Belgian Congo, on April 19, and to have followed up this advantage by taking a German post at Ishange on the 22d. General Smuts and his British force have been held up by the weather conditions for some time past, and have not been able to advance in their invasion of the colony.

Conditions in Greece remain very unsettled. Venezelos is becoming more active and political trouble of importance in Greece itself seems brewing. The tension between Greece and the Allies continues severe, but no open breach has taken place. The Allies have practically abandoned their plan of transporting the Serbian troops at Corfu to Salonica across Greece, using the Greek railroads for that purpose, and are beginning to move these troops by sea. Great Britain has withdrawn some Australian and New Zealand troops both from Salonica and Egypt and sent them to the western front.

The White Star steamer Cymric, which left New York on April 29, loaded with a cargo of munitions and war supplies, was torpedoed by a German submarine on May 8 over a hundred miles from the Irish coast. The vessel did not sink immediately, but attempted to reach port. Ultimately, however, she sank.

The official announcement made by Great Britain that Australian and New Zealand troops have landed in France and have taken over a portion of the front is both interesting and suggestive, as it indicates that Great Britain must consider either the situation along the Suez Canal or in Egypt more satisfactory, or else is drawing these troops from Salonica, as these localities are the only ones where those forces of Great Britain's

"Little War Horse"

By ROBERT WILLIAMS LILLARD

A TALL, spare figure was Judge Lycurgus Doggett. His hair was thin and white. His long, old-fashioned coat was shiny at the elbows and threadbare at the seams. But his manners were courtly.

At the age of threescore years and ten he had retired from the bench, and, as many men do who quit their life work abruptly, he had grown old all at once. I boarded in his home for several months, and the money for my keep, I have reason to believe, was a welcome addition to the old man's income.

After supper one November evening the judge and I sat in the faded parlor, our antique mahogany chairs drawn close to a blaze that crackled under the white marble mantel.

"You may have observed that portrait of a child, there to the left of the mantelpiece?" suggested my host.

Yes, I had observed the photograph, for it was a photograph, and a queer one. Out of the dingy frame there peered a little boy with a thin face and big eyes—merry eyes withal, though in them was a sadness so elusive I wondered if the child himself had been aware that he was sad. The picture showed, moreover, that the lad wore braces, indicating that he was a cripple. But, cripple or no, he was clad like a soldier, with brass buttons and shoulder straps and a military cap. And he had made an effort to strike a jaunty, martial attitude before the camera.

"It's a picture of Little War Horse—that is, we used to call him Little War Horse," remarked the judge. "He'd have been seventeen today if he had lived. It's been nine years—"

He did not finish the sentence. For more than a minute he sat motionless and silent, staring into the fire, and yet I do not think he saw the fire at all. But perhaps, in the flames, his mind's eye did see the crippled boy marching and countermarching, as the crippled boy used to do, no doubt, before he died.

Presently the judge roused himself with a start.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said, distressed by his forgetfulness. "I'm an old man, sir. My thoughts go woolgathering."

Then he told me this story.

"I WASN'T feeling the best in the world," the judge began, "and I'd dropped in for Dr. Darby to look me over. The doctor'd written a prescription and told me how to take it, so there wasn't any occasion for my remaining longer, but I'd lingered for a chat. And while the doctor and I were talking about one thing and another, in walked Lonnie. Lonnie was the Little War Horse. I'd never seen the child before.

"My heart went out to him at once. He had some sort of spinal trouble—congenital - and he was a pathetic little fellow to look at.

"He hobbled up to the doctor.

"'This birdie's hurt; please make him well,' he said, and then he deposited on the table, sir, the forlornest, most bedraggled English sparrow that ever was. The bird's leg was broken.

"'Humm-m,' said the doctor, feeling the sparrow's leg deftly, 'this is a very serious case.'

"He didn't crack a smile, but when he turned his head so Lonnie couldn't see, he winked at me.

"'You hold the patient a minute, sonny, and then we'll operate,' he said.

"Lonnie gathered up his bird and the doctor began preparations. First he whittled out a splint, no bigger than a toothpick. Then he set and bound the leg.

"I wish you could have seen how intently the child watched every movement. Nothing escaped him. And, judging from the little fellow's expression, he suffered, in sympathy, quite as much, if not more, than the sparrow. At last, however, the operation was finished, and Lonnie took back his bird with a sigh of relief.

"'Nurse him good and bring him to me again in a few days,' said the doctor.

"'Yes, sir,' Lonnie replied, making for the door.

"I think he intended hurrying home to show the sparrow's bandaged leg to his mother, but he paused when he heard me ask, 'Who's your little friend, Dave?'

"I always call Dr. Darby 'Dave.' I've known him all his life, you see, and he's a good deal younger than I. He was only a schoolboy when the war closed.

"'Oh,' said Dave, 'I supposed you two were acquainted. Hold on, Lonnie,' he added.

"The child came back and stood beside the doctor, who patted him on the head and said as he did so, 'Judge, this is Master Lonnie Whittaker, Ed Whittaker's boy. Lonnie, this is Judge Doggett.'

"The child kept the bird clasped in his left hand and extended his right to me gravely. I took the hand as gravely as it was offered. It was a fragile hand, sir.

"I knew the little fellow's father, of course. He'd come from Atlanta two or three years before, and he had a cigar and stationery store on the Court House Square. We all got our city papers there.

"'Tell me about your bird. Where did you find him?' I asked.

"I wanted to draw the child out, for I was interested in him, and so would you have been, sir.

"'I found him in our yard,' Lonnie replied. 'Mama says the storm last night blew him out of his nest, an' she said I could bring him down to the doctor. Poor 'ittie birdie!'

"I wish you could have heard him say that—'poor 'ittie birdie!' I wish you could have seen with what exquisite tenderness he held the sparrow against his cheek for an instant.

"'You might call this Red Cross work, eh, sonny?' remarked the doctor, smiling.

"And then the doctor turned to me with a twinkle in his eyes.

"'Lonnie's hobby is war,' he explained. 'He's going to be a famous general one of these days.'

"The child's face lighted up.

"'Yes, yes!' the little fellow cried. 'I'm goin' to be a gen'ral when I get well an' grow up. I'm six now, goin' on seven.'

"I wanted to laugh. He was such a comical scrap to talk of being a general—a general, sir, of all things in the world. Why, he wasn't knee high to a duck, and he didn't weigh more'n three dozen pounds, if he weighed that.

"But I didn't laugh. Somehow nobody ever laughed at Lonnie.

"'Sit down, son,' said the doctor; and the child squatted on a carpet-covered footstool, the sparrow nestling in his lap. He had been excited by the doctor's reference to his military aspirations, and his eyes were sparkling.

"'I know all about Leonidas,' he said eagerly. 'I was named for him, an' he was wonderful brave, too. An' I know about Alexander and Cæsar an' Napoleum Bonaparte. I'm goin' to be like them when I get well an' grow up.'

"'But weren't they kind o' rough, bloodthirsty fellows?' the doctor suggested.

"'Oh, but they weren't afraid,' came the answer quickly. 'I want to be brave, too.'

"The child turned to me with a roguish glimmer in his eyes.

"'I'll bet you can't guess why my daddy calls me Little War Horse?' he said in a bantering tone.

"'That is a poser,' I confessed. 'Why do he call you Little War Horse?'

"The child clapped his hands and giggled.

"'I knew you couldn't guess,' he cried triumpha ly. 'It's 'cause I wear harness!'

"I reckon I'm touchy about children, sir, bu you could have knocked me down with a feather. The idea of his making a joke of his braces!

"'We have lots of fun, daddy an' I,' he r led on. 'I wait on the front porch an' jump out from behind the mornin' glory vines an' neig an' prance an' stamp my feet, when daddy comes i the gate. An' he plays like he's terrible scared an' makes like he's goin' to run away. An' 'en I ller to him, "Don't be scared; it's only me; it's Lon ." An' 'en he says, "My, my! I thought it was ild war horse; I thought I was goin' to be eaten p!" An' 'en we both laugh an' laugh an' laugh, a he hugs and kisses me.

"'Oh, we do have such fun, daddy a I!' he sighed rapturously.

"Then the child and I talked of heroe ind arms and glory—of Grant and Lee, Ja son and many others. And Lonnie was an ecstasy, his face a-shining. You see, he ked to hear the great commanders praise as you and I are pleased when some one pays a tribute to a friend of ours. B all the while he kept on stroking the bird his lap; and the bird, its pain eased, we to sleep.

"Really brave men, I have observe are all like that. They are tender, sir; as t der as women oftentimes.

"'Were you ever a soldier?' Lonnie ked me suddenly.

"Before I could reply the doctor had b ken in.

"'Judge Doggett was a Confederat soldier,' he said. 'He was wounded several nes at Fredericksburg. He was defendi a Confederate flag the Yankees were after "Lonnie regarded me with a new int est.

"'I bet you were proud that da he said.

"'It was nothing much,' I answered. ny man in my company would have don the same or more than I did. Any one of em would have died for our flag.'

"The child's face grew wistful.

"'I'd die for our flag too,' he said, as he were talking to himself. 'I'd like to ave a soldier's funeral, with the flag lyin' my coffin like a couch cover. I think ou flag is the most beautiful thing in the world. An' I'd like to have the other soldiers ma to the cemetery an' shoot off their guns my grave and one of them blow his horn at t ast —"Good-by! Good-by! Good-by!" hat do they call that—"pats"?'

"'Taps,' I corrected.

"'Oh, yes,' he said, 'I know. The s a picture of a soldier's funeral in a book my house, an' mama told me what the pi ures mean.'

"I think he would have said more, b the thought of his mother recalled to him t he hadn't yet shown her his 'mended' bird, so he t us good-by and left.

"BUT after that he used to come frequently my chambers in the court house, and we'd to walk together, too. We got to be great frien I was pleased to discover, in our walks, how p ular he was. Everybody seemed to know and lov im. Whenever he passed a person on the street i was 'Hello, Lonnie!' or 'Howdy, General!' or ybe just a silent military salute, which he'd retur vith dignity.

"Then, before long, the Darbydale Rifles— at's our local militia company—chose him for their m cot, and Ed Whittaker fitted out the little fellow in uniform just like a general's, sir, with the stars and gles on the shoulder straps and collar. You can s for yourself. Lonnie's wearing the uniform in the p ure yonder. My, but he was proud of those clothe

"Ed used to take the child to the Rifles' l in the Opera House on drill nights, and the boys ade a lot of their mascot. They taught him the ma l of arms, and he used to go through it, sir, in my fice with my cane for a gun. He had a manual his own—one the boys had given him—and I u l to hold the book and act as drill sergeant. I l to use the book, you see, for they've changed a si t of things since I did any drilling. I'd move the airs out of his way and put on my spectacles a sit down at my desk by the window. Then I' give the command,

"You should have seen him straighten up a try desperately to throw out his chest. I think had forgotten his braces altogether. Indeed, I thi he

HEROES

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

AWAY from all the music, serene from noise and pain,
The soldier dead are sleeping, who will not wake again.
Their comrades, blind with memories, are placing blossoms sweet
Above those hearts, once war-worn, that long have ceased to beat.
And oh, the tears are falling, and softly people pray,
For valiant dead are resting on Decoration Day.

OFF in the dusty cities, amid the dirt and noise,
About their tasks a million of noble men and boys
Are working that their loved ones may never feel the dread
Of poverty: of begging from men their daily bread.
What blossoms do we give them? For none more brave than they Who, fighting, win no glory on Decoration Day.

The mother at her sewing with tired, dream-filled eyes,
In search of rest and comfort and hope that never dies;
The teacher and the pastor who lead young minds and old,
And droop, too worn to struggle, with hands too weak to hold—
Their trenches are the discords that block them on the way;
What flowers shall we give them on Decoration Day?

ha forgotten where he was. In his imagination my office had faded away magically, and he stood wi his brigade, sir, on a great green parade ground, wi the colors flying from a lofty staff and the band pla ng 'The Star-Spangled Banner.'

No doubt, too, the spell of his imagination was up me, and in his eyes I was no longer a white-ha d old man, seated at a desk. I think he saw me, sir s a dashing commander on a restless white horse, wi a sword in my hand.

'Attention! Right dress!'

How his eyes beamed!

'Present arms! Carry arms! Shoulder arms! Fo ard—march!!! Guide right! Halt! Mark tin! Halt!'

We went through it all. You would have been am sed, most likely, to see such a pair so engaged, bu it was serious business with us. I can tell you, sir.

"LONNIE was custodian of the Rifles' flag, which was kept in a special locker, and the key was en usted to the child. He wore that key on a string ar nd his neck, and he got into the habit of feeling ev little while to see if it was there. The re-sp sibility was on his mind continually.

On drill nights he'd get the flag out with his own ha s, and when he was first made mascot to the Ri s, so they told me, he used to stand at attention, wi the butt of the staff grounded on the floor, wh the company drilled. But he was too weak to be his feet long at a time, so the boys persuaded hi to sit and hold the colors while they were on the flo. They did that tactfully, of course. They cal his chair 'headquarters' and 'the general's ter ' which took away the sting of being a weakling, do you see, and made Lonnie proud and happy.

He loved the flag.

When I have it in my hands,' he told me, 'I feel str g and big. I feel like there isn't anything the ma er with my back then. Oh, I'd be so glad to di o keep the flag flying.'

That's right,' I told him. 'The flag's a symbol of verything American—our ideals, our sacrifices, ou victories. It stands for liberty at home and the strength and the will and the courage to make the principles of our people respected everywhere, by all mankind. It's right to love the flag, Lonnie.'

"'I do—I do love it!' he cried.

"And he did. By heaven, sir, he proved he did!

"He'd been with his father at the store one evening and they'd started home after Ed had closed up the shop for the night, but they hadn't gotten a dozen yards from the door when they heard a cry of 'Fire!'

"A block away, to the east, there was a great pillar of smoke and flame against the sky.

"'Daddy,' shouted Lonnie, 'it's the Rifles' Hall—it's the Opera House!'

"ED WHITTAKER took the child in his arms and ran toward the blaze. By that time some one was pounding like mad on the engine tire we have for a fire alarm, and a crowd was gathering. They were getting out the engines. Cohen's store was ablaze and the Opera House next door was threatened. The Rifles' Hall was on the second floor of the Opera House.

"'Wait for me here,' Ed Whittaker said, putting the boy down in a doorway more than half a block from the flames.

"Then away went Ed to help the volunteers man the engines.

"Nobody noticed Lonnie. Nobody saw him hobble across the street. Nobody saw him enter the door that led to the Rifles' Hall. They were all too excited. They thought the town was about to be swept away.

"But Lonnie was thinking of the flag—the Rifles' flag that he was bound to defend.

"God knows how he made his way up the stairs. God knows how he found the locker and got out the flag. But somehow he did these things.

"And when he turned to come back, fire barred the way. The stairs had become a furnace. The child was trapped.

"A cry went up from the street. The crowd had seen him at a window. He had the flag. He thrust it out and called to the men below:

"'Catch it! Catch the flag!'

"For a fraction of a second they saw him there, the light of the flames on his little white face.

"Then a great red billow rolled past the window and spouted through like a torch.

"Down came the flag, but Lonnie had disappeared.

"The whole town was at his funeral. You never saw so many flowers—at least, we never did. It was a military funeral. The Darbydale Rifles turned out and the town band led the procession. The boys sent away and got an artillery caisson and put the little coffin on that. And over the coffin they draped the flag, the burned and tattered flag that Lonnie had given his life to save.

"Slowly and sadly we made the journey. The band went first, playing Chopin's funeral march. Then came the Rifles, then the caisson with the flag-draped coffin, then the veterans in carriages, and then the people—men and women and children.

"We have a beautiful cemetery, sir, out yonder west of town. Evergreen Cemetery, we call it. Lonnie's grave was on a hillside, near the Confederate Monument, and close to the plot where the old fellows who wore the gray keep their final bivouac.

"The religious services were brief, sir—brief but impressive. Then a squad of the Rifles stepped forward and fired a salute of honor over the grave, after which a bugler sounded 'taps'—the sweetest music in the world, sir—the soldiers' farewell to the brave."

The fire had all but burned out while the judge was telling his tale, and the lamp on the parlor table had gotten dim and murky. We sat in dusk.

"On his tombstone," said the judge presently, "there is inscribed:

"'In Memory of Leonidas Whittaker,
Soldier and Patriot.'"

The judge mused for a moment.

"I was out there today and read that," he said. "This is his birthday, you know, and I laid a wreath of laurel on his monument."

Uncle Sam, Collector of Islands

WHEN, in 1494, Christopher Columbus made his second trip of discovery to the Indies, he came upon a group of lands of such beauty that he called th the Virgin Islands. These islands ar now known as Crab, Culebra, St. Th nas, St. John, St. Croix or Santa Cr, Tortola, Virgin Gorda and Anega. They are all mountainous and ha a total area of 328 square miles and a pulation, mostly negro, of 50,000. Th first two named, Crab and Culebra, no belong to the United States, their ar is 130 square miles and their popula n 12,000. St. John, St. Thomas and St Croix have been under Danish sovereignty since 1815, their area is 140 sq re miles and their population 33 00. The balance of the group, havin 58 square miles and 5,562 populati, is a part of the far-flung empire of th British sovereign. Spain, Holland, Fr ce, England and Denmark have ov ed these islands, and now, Denmark be g reported once more in a mood to se the suggestion is again made that th United States purchase the islands.

is some years since the United St es began collecting islands. It be n when we gathered in the Aleutian Is nds along with the purchase of A ka. Then we benevolently assimila l a few of the coral reefs and islands of amoa, for strategical reasons; having a vy we must have coaling stations an naval bases. Then, good Queen L okalani having been deposed by h white subjects, and the Spanish war be g on our hands, we accumulated the H vaiian Islands for strategical and ot r reasons. We couldn't bear the th ght of some possible future enemy se ng them and directing a stream of v anic eruptions upon our peaceful w tern shores. At the same time, ha ing disciplined the proud Don, and ha ing in the process possessed ourse es of sundry islands once his proper , and finding no precedent for the re rn of them, he having put us to some di omfort and expense in acquiring th n, we promptly paid him $20,000,000 he tsease in the coin of the U. S. A. and de ared ourselves lawfully possessed o hat which we had taken. Thus came to us Guam, Porto Rico, the Philippi s, and crags, reefs, rocks and problems many and multiple. For all of this there were the most excellent strategical reasons. We had become a world power and must demean ourselves as such and live among the properties and scenery of greatness. A protectorate or two, and our position as receiver in general for all financially embarrassed peoples and nations to the south of us, have brought us practical sovereignty over more islands, and so we are not facing a new suggestion in taking up the proposition to purchase these islands, which long ago ceased to be profitable to Denmark and which might be of use to us, for strategical reasons.

The port of St. Thomas or Charlotte Amalie, was at one time the greatest commercial port in the West Indies, its business being largely that of a coaling and transshipment station on the trade routes between Europe and the Caribbean Islands and Central America. St. Thomas has the best harbor in the West Indies and the only one that can be entered at any time of the day or night at any season of the year. On account of shorter routes and the influence of the growing trade between American ports and South American and West Indian ports, the priority of St. Thomas in the West Indian trade gradually passed to the Barbadoes, and St. Thomas languished in the memories of forgotten glory.

IN 1865 Secretary of State William H. Seward took up with the government of Denmark the question of the purchase of these Danish possessions, but the Danish government did not consider the proposition favorably. In 1866 Mr. Seward offered Denmark $5,000,000 for the islands and adjacent islets, and in 1867 a convention was drawn up for the cession of the islands on a payment of $7,500,000. Negotiations were dropped on the eve of the national political campaign of 1868 and were not then reopened. In 1892 and again in 1896 the purchase was a matter of discussion, and in 1902 Secretary of State John Hay and Constantin Brun, Danish minister to the United States, signed a convention for the cession of the islands to the United States in return for a sum of money something under $5,000,000. The convention was ratified by the American Senate and by the lower house of the Danish Rigsdag. When the convention came up for passage in the Landsthing, the Danish House of Lords, a strong movement against it appeared. Danish residents of the islands petitioned their native country not to part with the islands, not to expatriate them for American gold, but hardheaded business men found in the convention an opportunity to unload a losing investment, and feeling ran high. There were suggestions then that German influences were at work to prevent the sale, but whether Germany was interested or not the debate showed that the vote would be close, and one nobleman, 92 years old and bedridden, was carried to the meeting of the Landsthing in order that he might vote against the convention. The vote stood 16 to 16, and the presiding officer cast the deciding vote against the sale.

Since 1902 Denmark has been investing considerable money in the islands in an effort to bring back again some measure of their former prosperity. The harbor at St. Thomas has been greatly improved and $2,000,000 has been spent on piers and docks. Recently there has been a strike of the negroes; health conditions are bad; the islands are costing Denmark a net loss of $150,000 a year, and there are no strategical reasons, only sentimental ones, which would lead Denmark to retain possession of the islands.

THERE are reasons, principally strategical, which make it worth while for the United States to pay a few millions for another small annual deficit. Washington dispatches of May 4 intimated that Dr. Brun and Secretary Lansing had about concluded an agreement for the transfer of the Islands and that it was planned to have the treaty of cession ratified simultaneously in Washington and in Copenhagen. Both Secretary Lansing and the Danish Minister refused to discuss the question, but the rumors continued to gain in persistence and credibility, although officially denied in Copenhagen.

The Time to Make Peace

AT last the hour is at hand when America, in justice to the whole world and to itself, must act in behalf of peace. The combatant nations have fought until their physical and financial resources are nearing exhaustion. With all of their splendid courage, their heroic endurance and their skilful generalship, a point has been reached beyond which they make no progress toward a decisive climax.

Victory that would end the war is nowhere in sight. Not one of all the powers engaged in the conflict has succeeded in reaching the great object at which it aimed. Their wounds are far deeper than they care to admit. Every day further depletes their strength, and every week witnesses the sacrifice of thousands of lives, uselessly thrown away.

Under the circumstances, as the recognized leader of the neutral nations, it becomes our duty to interpose, for the sake of humanity alone if for no other consideration. We must speak out for peace and speak with boldness. Indications are multiplying that Germany is willing to listen to a friendly voice, and it may be that the first important step peaceward is to be found in the latest exchange of diplomatic notes between Berlin and Washington. England and France at heart both earnestly desire peace. Russia has made vast sacrifices that will take a generation to repair, and her people are hungering for peace. Other nations involved have suffered so deeply that they too are longing for the hour when the war shall end.

This is the psychological moment. A proposition from the Western republic, in which all the neutral nations would heartily join, while it would have been made in vain six months ago, would be listened to now by all the cabinets of Europe.

The time has come for us to put forth a mighty effort to end the war. Today all Europe is pacifist at heart; its populations are sick of the struggle, which has torn from them all they hold dear and which even now is taking the striplings to cast them into graves beside their fathers and elder brothers. Of some of the afflicted lands it may almost be said that "half the population is at the front and the other half is on the bread line." We need say nothing here of the depleted national treasuries, the enormous burden of taxation, the economic and industrial losses; these are simply beyond all reckoning. The loss to humanity is itself reason enough to demand action on our part. The ashes of the great war are still red and glowing, but the fury of the conflict is dying. The strength is spent, though the orgy of slaughter proceeds automatically, when it should long since have ceased.

It is time to act in the name of mercy. It is a duty we owe to God, to stricken Europe and Asia, and to our own sense of higher responsibility, to take immediate steps for mediation. That a few voices are still to be found in England and on the Continent that talk boastfully of prolonging the war, should count for nothing. Over all there rise the loud murmurs of a myriad tongues appealing for peace. Shall they appeal in vain?

Affirmations and denials of peace overtures are to be expected, but these should not deter us. An effort must be made to draw the principal powers together on common grounds. If as a prelude to formal negotiations some concession must necessarily be made by one side or other, it should be our task to urge the wisdom of such a course, that it may become the means of removing all barriers and of setting the machinery of diplomacy in motion. Jealousy and suspicion will cease the moment the first definite step is taken, and the good work, once begun, will go forward.

May our government be inspired with courage and wisdom to undertake this great task, and may the divine blessing attend all efforts that are earnestly and unselfishly made to bring enduring peace to the world.

The President on Militarism

> I HAVE never dreamed for a moment that America as a whole—its rank and file—had got any military enthusiasm or militaristic spirit, and I think that it is very necessary, in order that we should work this thing out wisely, that we should carefully discriminate between reasonable preparation and militarism. I think it would be a disservice not to recognize that there is a point of reasonable preparation, and that you can go to that point without changing the spirit of the country or violating its traditions. For the traditions of the country have not been those of a military helplessness, though they have been those of anti-militarism.

This was the view expressed by the President in an audience given to a committee of the American Union against Militarism in Washington a few days ago. The committee had apprised the President of the fact that large audiences in the Middle West had been enthusiastic in opposition to the program for a great army and navy, which they rightly regarded as a menace to democracy. "I am just as much opposed to militarism as any man living," said Mr. Wilson. "I think it is a deadly thing to get into the spirit of a nation, and there is not the slightest danger of its getting into the spirit of this nation." As to the naval program, he explained that there has not been any material change. Certain additions are determined on from year to year, and this plan is being followed, unaltered to any extent. Compulsory service he regarded as not contrary to national traditions, but he had never said he believed in it; his mind is "to let" on that particular subject.

These are words that sound well to the ear, but they may mean much or little, as the outcome will reveal. Militarism is before the bar of judgment in America today. An overwhelming majority of the people have pronounced against it. That Congress stands with the people is shown by the rejection in the lower House, on May 8, of the Senate bill for an army of 250,000, the vote standing 221 to 142. The Senate stands by its original proposition, and the result is a deadlock.

Let us hope that when militarism makes its final effort, Congress will be left free to perform its obvious duty in dealing with it as the nation desires. Reasonable measures for defense, yes; vast armaments out of all proportion to our needs, no!

Stamp out the menace of militarism irredeemably; and let us go forward as a sane, reasonable people, keeping our heads while, as the President has observed, "all the rest of the world is seeing red."

The Joyful Parader

PARADING has become one of the dearest delights of the American heart. It may well be questioned whether there is a single emotion, individual or collective, which is not ready to take this form of expressing itself. May, the favorite month of the paraders, has this year broken all records. We have had "preparedness" parades, parades of Suffragettes, of babies, of political partisans, Sunday schools, temperance folks, and at least a dozen varieties of labor parades, including waiters, shirtwaist makers, and cloak-makers, besides other parades without end. In the big cities, street traffic has been blocked for hours while the pageants passed before multitudes of delighted spectators. In the country districts the joy of the parade has stirred up localities that hardly know a thrill during the rest of the year. It has been a great season for music and marching, and as the big political parades are still ahead, we may safely assume that "the worst is yet to come." We are an enthusiastic people, and when the parade bug, warmed into activity by the mild weather, fairly gets in his work, we have simply got to march. Any pretext will do to justify a parade. Jubilation, sorrow, indignation, patriotism, friendship, antagonism, all find expression in the heart of the average citizen as, wearing a big badge and a genial smile, he marches with ardor behind the band for hours, as long as his legs can keep time to the music or his voice can raise a cheer. Then when the day is over, tired and footsore he goes home, proudly conscious of the fact that he has done his duty. He has been in the parade.

Indiana's Centenary

BETTER than the old, stilted, formal way of doing things is the Indiana method of announcing the approaching celebration of the Hoosier State's hundredth birthday. Summoning to its aid some of its brightest citizen talent, the Historical Commission has struck a new and refreshing note in inviting the sons and daughters of the state, who are now beyond its boundaries, to "come back and celebrate with the home folks." George Ade gives the keynote to the invitation when he adds, "It will be the first and probably the last and only chance you, as a Hoosier, will have to meet your old friends at your old home." James Whitcomb Riley, too, has a word to say to distant Indianians who are summoned to return. This is the burden of his song:

"The Hoosier in Exile, forsooth!
  For though his steps may roam
The earth's remotest bounds, in truth
  His heart is ever home!
O loyal still to every tie!
  O native fields and streams!
His boyhood friends, and paths whereby
  He finds them in his dreams!"

And then, to tempt them still further, he pictures the great orchards that will be fruit-laden by celebration time, "where blossoms grow the white and apples are the reddest." Quite a bunch of t old boys who have become distinguished now, bu who cannot forget the joys of those far-off early ears, join in the invitation. Every suggestion th can appeal to memory, every touching picture of th past: the old homestead, the moss-covered bucket, th barn where you played hide-and-seek and hid Easte ggs, the swimming-hole, and all the joys and pran and cut-ups are conjured out of the past to dra the wanderer home for the big event. Just think the genius that is compressed into a booklet for hich such celebrities as Booth Tarkington, Tom Ma hall, Charles W. Fairbanks, J. P. Dunn, Meredith N holson and others are included. The appeal sho l be irresistible—to Indianians at least. All the ol olks are going to be young again; they are going back home for a frolic and to live over the kindly p for a season. They are going to have a great tin and to demonstrate to the world that they are gla and proud that they were born in Indiana, conc ning which, Booth Tarkington says in his "invite," uoting, with a fine rhetorical flourish, from Shern n of Decatur, "the grand old state of Indiana v go crashing down the ages, with her head up a her tail over the dashboard!" We congratulate I iana and all of its sons and daughters wherever hey may be, and trust they may have a sp ndid celebration.

A Torch That Must Not Go Ou

YEARS ago Christian Herald readers ligh d a torch in China destined to guide man and many Chinese souls up the pathway fro sin and superstition to the foot of the cross. Wh the Christian Herald's part in this work shall hav been completed, over one thousand Chinese orphans nost of whom had been abandoned to the tender mer s of heathen cupidity and vice, will have been rea l in Christian environment, taught the Christian re ion, furnished with a good school education, and s rted on their life work well equipped for success. A the great majority of these redeemed lives, if not ind l all of them, will be messengers of the Cross. hat greater messengers of the Gospel of Christ coulc iere be than men and women who have received s h a start in life in the name of Christ himself!

We could present to you here a picture of cl lish heart-hunger for parent love that would mov you greatly; but we prefer to set before you this eat opportunity to strengthen the missionary for s in China. Our readers have lovingly, generously and, we will add, wisely supported this work from its art. It is, of course, necessary that we publish state ents of its needs from time to time in order that new aders, who have not yet realized what is going on nay have a share in the work. There are now 697 of iese orphans in different parts of China dependent pon our care. If it were not for the gifts from Chı ian Herald readers they could not be kept in the oı anages, safeguarded against the fate that has a ays crouched at the door hoping yet to get its vi ms, and trained with a loving care in the principles the Christian religion. Very shortly we must forwa l to the different orphanages the usual quarterly nittance approximating $3,485. In entire confiden we ask our readers to send us this amount at once. ose who send twenty dollars become benefactors c one child, whose entire support for a year is that im. But in this precious enterprise every one may h e a part, and gifts of every size are welcome. We ar ure that you will make it possible to forward the qua rly remittance on time. Please address the Chines Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, ew York.

From Washington's Farewell Addr s

THE great rule of conduct for us, in regard to f eign nations, is, in extending our commercial relatio to have with them as little political connection as possibl

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us ave none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be en ged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are esse ally foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be u vise in us to implicate ourselves, by aritficial ties, in the orc ary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinatior and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enal us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people der an efficient government, the period is not far off when w hay defy material injury from external annoyance; when w hay take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we n at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; hen belligerent nations, under the impossibility of makir acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us p vocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our int sts, guided by justice, shall counsel.

M hodist General Conference

THE twenty-seventh General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the largest Protestant denomination in An ica, opened its session in Saratoga Sp gs, N. Y., on May 1, to continue a nth. The 800 delegates, 400 minist, and 400 laymen, answered to the oll call, and 1,000 others were pre nt as visitors. The delegates repres t 133 annual conferences. Twenty-nin bishops were in attendan Bishop John Hamilton, in e episcopal address, recom ending the organic union of Methodist churches, assai child labor and other evi Its declaration on the na nal prohibition of the liq r traffic stirred the confer ce into the highest enth asm. The address was the ustomary message which the bishops send expressing the opinion on the important qu ions to be discussed and act upon, but it has no offici bearing on the action of the onference. The Methodist hurch is great in numbe and wealth, but greater in simple faith in the Book and he Redeemer, in the witne ng power of the Holy G t to purify the heart and sa ify it to practical service for en, in its courage in fighting rongs and in its zeal in bri ing souls to Christ, "who ga himself for us, that he mi t redeem us from all iniqui and purify unto himself a culiar people, zealous of go works." (Titus 2 : 14.)

I erest for Fifty Years

THEODORE L. TERRY, the assistant postmaster at urel, Long Island, was on a ain fifty years ago when th conductor was about to pu a young fellow off for not pa ng his fare, and he put up th needed few cents and en led the boy to continue hi ide. Recently Mr. Terry, no seventy-two years old, re ved a five dollar bill, ge ine money, with a note in ating that the sender had co ted up the interest on the fe cents advanced, and that it ounted to the five dollars. Th letter was printed to di ise the identity, and the po mark was blurred and n listinguishable. The smalles possible acts of kindness have a m velously rapid way of multiplying th selves. What a harvest good peopl vill have in the compounded interest o he little deeds of love! The incide calls up these words: "Cast thy br d upon the waters, for thou shalt find it ter many days." (Eccles. 11 : 1.)

City's Low Fire Record

I his annual report recently made, ire Commissioner Robert Adamson, of ew York, said that in 1915 the fire lo was the lowest per capita in the hi ory of the city. The average loss fo each fire, the report stated, also w the lowest. The fire loss was lower b 2 cents per capita than in any previo year, and the total loss lower by $ 60,793 than in 1914. There were 1, 0 fewer fires and an aggregate loss of nly $5,757,018, as against $8,217,811 t preceding year. The per capita lo was only $1.06; the lowest previous lo was $1.38. The loss per fire was $429.00; the lowest previous loss—that of 1914—was $569.69. In only two other years since consolidation, a period of eighteen years of rapidly growing population, has the total loss been beneath $7,000,000. Fires during the year numbered 13,416. Of these 7,951 were trivial blazes, extinguished without the aid of a fire engine; 3,509 fires were so small as to be extinguished by one stream. From any single fire the heaviest loss was $150,000. Increased fire restrictions, improved enginery in fighting fires, emphasis on prevention of fire, and the wisdom, courage, and activity of the members of the department have all contributed to the result of the record-breaking year. It is a pity that with such success in the protection of property there should be such poor success in the protection of life, that there is an average of one death by accident every day and one by homicide every other day in the metropolis. Even a greater pity that while many ministers and church people are doing duty, so few souls comparatively are saved from the organized institutions of vice and crime. What the early Christians did by faith in extinguishing fires, the department in New York did in practical endeavor as it "quenched the violence of fire." (Heb. 11 : 34.)

Spirited Cavalry Group for Grant Memorial

CONGRESS, in February, 1901, authorized the building of a memorial to General U. S. Grant at an expense of $250,000. It was to have been completed in five years, but numerous extensions of time have been necessary. The cavalry group, representing a color squad in a spirited charge has recently reached Washington. This is the second of the three most important bronzes for the memorial in the extreme eastern end of the Botanical Gardens, across First Street from the Capitol grounds. It stands on the opposite end of the masonry substructure from the military group. Henry M. Grady is the sculptor, and Edward P. Casey is the architect of the memorial. No marble or bronze can add to the fame of Grant as a general or man. They are important, however, in interpreting to the living the sacrifices of the past for the preservation of the commonwealth, in enforcing the practical duty of maintaining it and inspiring the future generations with higher ideals of virtue and service. Lee was universally respected and loved in the North, while Grant had the respect and affection of the people of the South. The cavalry group of the monument will call to mind the scene where Grant refused to take the sword of Lee, and bade him take his men and horses of war back home to plow the fields of peace. How well they did that work! One of the miracles of our national life is the manner in which the New South has sprung up out of the bankruptcy and wreck of war into courage, industry, thrift, and progress in every direction, material, mental, moral and spiritual. Figures show that in the past twenty-five years the South has made a far greater progress in proportion than the whole country at large. The Grant Memorial will speak of sacrifices endured, of slavery abolished, of the Union saved, of a glorious New South and a glorious New North in amicable competition in human service. Memorial monuments are frequently mentioned in the Scriptures, as in this passage: "And these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel." (Joshua 4 : 7.)

House Built in Twelve Hours

AT four o'clock in the morning of May 2 seventy-two carpenters began to build a house from the ground up in Toledo, Ohio, and at four o'clock the same afternoon it was completed in every detail, and Mrs. Emma Plessner McCann was serving tea to Mayor Milroy and others. The house and lot were a wedding present. After the carpenter work had progressed a short time, plumbers, gas fitters, painters, paper hangers, electricians and other workmen did their share of the work in a given time. More than 200 workmen had a hand in the building, which is a five-room house with bathroom, costing $4,000. This was simply a feat awakening admiration. Ordinarily it takes time to construct a material house. God takes time to build up the body as the residence of the soul, or the soul as his dwelling-place. The apostle thus refers to one of the greatest and sweetest facts of human experience; "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (I Cor. 3 : 16.)

Mikado Decorates Missionary

JUST before leaving Japan for the session of the General Conference in Saratoga, N. Y., Bishop M. C. Harris of the Methodist Episcopal Church was tendered a banquet in Tokyo, and received from the Mikado the decoration of the Second Order of the Sacred Treasure. At the banquet Baron Ishii, minister of foreign affairs, brought him in person the decoration. Among those making speeches were the American ambassador, Viscount Taneka, formerly Japanese minister to Washington, Mr. Shimada, president of the Lower House, and I. Tokutomi, a member of the House of Peers. A resolution was passed expressing the gratitude of the nation for Bishop Harris's disinterested service during the many years of his stay in Japan. A mansion was offered in token of the desire entertained that he should return to Japan and spend the rest of his life among the people he loved so well and had so faithfully served and blessed as a missionary. The late emperor decorated Bishop Harris with the Third Order of the Sacred Treasure. At the banquet Viscount Taneka described him as a man who put into actual practice the high moral principles of Christianity; and the American ambassador held that the success of Bishop Harris was the success of humanity. The bishop and the other missionaries in Japan and in foreign fields everywhere have been decorated by the King of heaven with the Order of the Sacred Cross, and charm kings on their thrones, and the humblest peasants in the realm, obeying this injunction: "Do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry." (II Tim. 4 : 5.)

Played Pauper

A MAN known as "the poverty-stricken cabinetmaker" died in an old, dirty, dingy room in a tumbledown shack in Erie, Pa., the other day, to all appearances a pauper. At his death, papers were found revealing the fact that he had $20,000 laid away. The money and securities had been hidden away in an old disused chimney, running through the old man's room. It consisted of cash, paper money and gold that had been hoarded for years; a certificate of deposit in the First National Bank of Erie for $500, and $15,000 worth of valuable railroad stock. The old man had been cared for during the winter by John H. Walker, a merchant of Erie, and E. C. Clark, superintendent of the Erie Rescue Mission. They believed him a worthy object of charity, and thought his sole support came from the money and food they gave him. The old man was as well provided for for a rainy day as the millionaire. No one but himself to care for, he could have lived in a self-respecting manner, given some to the real poor, and to the church of God. Christ in his severe arraignment of avarice in the parable says: "Thou foolish one, this night is thy soul required of thee." (Luke 12 : 20, R. V.)

Violin Eases Death

MARVILLE SHAW was dangerously ill in a hospital in Minneapolis recently, and being told that he would likely not live the night through asked a friend to play the violin to him as he passed out of the world. As his friend played "Nearer, My God, to Thee," Marville Shaw sank into unconsciousness and slipped away. The prophet, speaking of the return of the children of Israel to their own land, gives us this symbol of the happy entrance of a redeemed soul into the heavenly kingdom: "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs." (Isa. 35 : 10.)

NOT FORSAKEN

For four months they had eaten food sent from America.
Then, only two days ago, the battle had swept through their village
Afterward their mother crept away to seek food. She had not returned.
Now hunger drove them forth.

Plowed into fantastic ditches, the unfamiliar world lay misshapen, dead.
The church lay ruinous, deserted.
"Was God dead?"

Then there came to her thoughts of the unknown friends in America who had sent so much precious food.
The love that Jesus taught must have prompted them.
Jesus had loved little children.
"He will care for baby and me," she thought.

Some Fruit Trees You Should Know

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., President of Christian Endeavor

THE Bible is an interesting book for the horticulturist, for it contains much about trees, from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil of which we are told in Genesis, to the tree of life which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month. The psalmist was fond of trees, and he could find no better simile for the righteous man than "the tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season." Solomon was said to speak of trees, "from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." If he included all trees in that category, he was indeed a wise man, since there are more than a hundred varieties of oaks, and as many more of pines and palms.

But this article has to do chiefly with rare fruit trees. If the apple is the king of fruits, and the orange is the queen, as some people assert, there are many dukes and duchesses, lords and ladies of the vegetable kingdom whose acquaintance is much more of a joy than that of some members of the flesh-and-blood nobility.

In temperate zones our range of fruits is much more limited than in the tropics, or if a few stray specimens from warmer climes reach our fruit stores, their price is prohibitive for moderate pocketbooks. The banana and pineapple are tropical fruits, it is true, that are as common in our markets as the indigenous apple and pear, but many of us have never seen them growing, and might easily be deceived by the Münchhausen tales of the fireside traveler who has never crossed the ocean, but claims that in the countries where he has been "the pine trees are loaded with delicious pineapples, and the banana trees covered the ground with bananas as thick as pumpkins in a Kansas cornfield."

A great field of pineapples such as one sees in Hawaii, covering hundreds of acres, is indeed a beautiful sight. At a distance one sees nothing but a great expanse of greenish blue, which contrasts happily with the red soil in which the pines flourish best. As you get nearer, the luscious fruit, growing a golden yellow as it approaches maturity, appears like a miniature forest, whose tallest specimens are not two feet tall. The "rattoon crop" of pineapples, which means the second crop grown from the same plants, is inferior to the first, and the strain soon runs out, as in humans, without the infusion of new blood. So the large planters are always on the lookout for pineapple seeds, which are very rare, not one "pine" in ten thousand producing seed, I am told, and prizes are offered for the discovery of a single seed by the workmen in the pineapple canning factories. So my readers can search their pineapples for seeds as they search their oysters for pearls, and are as likely to get rich from their fruit as from their bivalves.

THE banana loves hot weather as much as the pineapple, and will not flourish where the mercury even gets within twenty degrees of the freezing point. Its great prickly stalk grows like Jonah's gourd, and does not last much longer; but before it dies it hangs a big blood-red, heart-shaped blossom from its top, and this develops before the season is over into a bunch of yellow or red fruit of the most nutritious character. So prolific is it that the fruit can be transported two thousand miles and then be sold often for ten cents a dozen. What a boon old Captain Baker of Cape Cod conferred upon mankind when he introduced the banana to northern America, taking first a little schooner load from Jamaica, then another, and another, educating, by slow degrees, the conservative Yankees and New Yorkers in the value of this abundant fruit of the tropics, until now a fleet of a dozen large steamships plying between Jamaica, Central America, and the north are needed to supply the demand for this one fruit! Captain Baker may well be bracketed with the discoverers of the humble potato as a benefactor of his race. He has done more than Burbank himself to fill the poor man's dinner pail.

But where is the Captain Baker of the taro patch? The taro is a succulent root that grows luxuriantly in many tropical lands, and is enormously productive. It takes the place of the potato as a homely, wholesome, everyday accompaniment of the meat course. It tastes not unlike that unpretentious vegetable, but has a flavor all its own, and by many is liked much better. It is the chief staple of the natives of Hawaii, and from it is made the far-famed poi, which is more to the Kanaka than his macaroni is to the Italian, or his tamale is to the Mexican. Doubtless the taro could be raised in our southernmost states, and if somebody would introduce it and create an appetite for it, as Captain Baker did for the banana, we would have another valuable staple of food, cheaper, more prolific and more nutritious than the potato. Any one who has seen the native Hawaiian at a luau, winding the sticky, glutinous poi round his fingers, as in the old-fashioned style before forks took the place of the ancient natural table implements, would never doubt that poi is the most delectable tidbit in the world.

ANOTHER Captain Baker is needed to introduce the papaya, the most delicious of breakfast fruits. No one who has laid the foundation for his bacon and eggs or his coffee and rolls with a quarter section of papaya will ever sigh for grapefruit or oranges when he can get this tree melon. The papaya is a kind of super-excellent melon that grows on the top of a scaly, ungainly tree that looks like a small telegraph pole with a tuft of leaves on top. Under the tuft of leaves grows a luster of this greenish-yellow fruit, the full-grown specimens weighing four or five pounds or more. The fruit is not only delicious, but it possesses a tonic, medicinal quality which makes it particularly wholesome to begin the day with. One difficulty in introducing the papaya on a large scale would be its perishable nature. It is not a good keeper, but cold storage can do wonders for frail fruit, and, since one can have a delectable breakfast dish which disguises at the same time a dose of regulative medicine, why should not growers and shippers put their heads together and devise a way to get the papaya at a reasonable price into our northern markets?

The breadfruit is another g of Mother Nature that I would like see more widely introduced amon my friends. As a boy my imaginati was stirred by the thought of the bre ruit tree, and the dusky natives reach g up and picking something that look like loaves of fresh-baked bread fr its over-laden branches. How di rent from our boyhood dreams is, very ten, the reality! The reality in this se is very beautiful, if not so toothson as I imagined. There are few hand mer trees than a symmetrical brea uit. Its leaves are intensely gree and glossy, and some of them almost nger than a palmleaf fan, but very eply serrated. The fruit is green and gl ular and rough on the outside, and abo the size of a small football, and tastes hen cooked, more like a potato tha like bread, though it has a distinct fla r of its own. I suppose it is called ead-fruit because, for the natives of ome islands, it is the "staff of life."

There are many other fruits li the soursap, the granadilla or passion uit, the persimmon and the pomegr ate, the interior of whose brown h k is filled with edible rubies; but I not know that any of these are of su ient value to be brought north on a arge scale. Specimens of them, as it can occasionally be found in our no ern fruit stalls.

There are, however, at least tw ther fruits that every traveler in the t pics would like to see often on his ta e at home: the mango and the avoca , or alligator pear. It requires some ica-tion to appreciate the former, tho gh a short course in mango lore is u ally sufficient; but the avocado you w like without half trying. As the C ese Christian said of his new-found re ion: "Christinaity is not like butter, ich you have to learn to like, but yo ove Christianity the first time you tas it." The alligator pear is like Christia y in this respect. It is an ungainly-lo king fruit with its exaggerated pear sha but the tree which bears it is a bea iful shade tree when fully grown in fav able soil, as large as an oak and as s rdy. So is the mango, and I have see few oaks or maples so large and symm ical as ome mangoes and avocados with wi h I am acquainted. These fruits, to are sometimes found in our city m kets, but when the dealer asks fifty ce s for a single “pear,” we are apt to sa “No, I thank you.” Who will be th pioneer to introduce on a large scale th e delicious fruits?

THE cocoanut, like the pineapple and the banana, is a tropical fruit with wi h we are all acquainted, and the yo nger we are the more we appreciate th rank, indigestible meat of this king of uts. Alas! in temperate climes, the sm l boy knows little of the really edible co anut, with its delicious, clear, water-co ed “milk,” and its jelly-like fruit; fo t must be picked very young to be wo h eating, and the youthful cocoanut ne r reaches northern shores, since it is on the hard old nut that is commer-cia y valuable. The cocoanut tree ra y grows straight, but leans to every po t of the compass. Moreover, it likes to have its feet in or near salt water, and does not flourish far inland. Mark Twain describes it as an exaggerated feather duster, but he does not do it justice, for, though it does not grow straight and shapely like its cousin, the royal palm, it has a grace of its own, and it has a fruit that is the sole wealth of many a coral island, and this is more than can be said of the more stately royal relative.

“How many, many fruits the Lord has made to satisfy the varied appetities of man!” is one's involuntary exclamation as he walks through a tropical garden. He seems to have consulted every taste and to have planted “in the midst of the street of it and on either side of the river” trees of life that yield their fruit “every month,” as is the fashion with many tropical trees. Trees of life for the physical man are they, and symbols of the tree of eternal life, of which all may eat and be forever satisfied.

FOR the purpose of conferring full American citizenship upon a group of 186 Yankton Sioux Indians, Se etary Franklin K. Lane of the D rtment of the Interior is on a trip to uth Dakota. This is the first real ste toward making effective the policy of ving all qualified Indians full contro of their individual affairs, and placing hem upon the same legal standing as ther American citizens. An interest g ceremonial has been arranged in co ection with the bestowal of citizenshi The Secretary, as the representativ of the Great White Father, informs th ndians that the President has sent hi to speak a solemn and serious word to em, “a word that means more to yo than any other you have ever he d. The President has been told th are some among you who should no nger be controlled by the Bureau of dian Affairs, but should be given th patents in fee and thus become fre American citizens. It is his decision th this shall be done, and that those so nored by the people of the United St es shall have the meaning of this ne and great privilege pointed out by symbol and by word, so that no an or woman shall not know its me ing.”

ch chosen Indian is then called out by is “white” name, and asked to tell his ndian name. When he does so, he is nded a bow and arrow and directed to oot the arrow. After he does this th Secretary says to him, calling him by is Indian name: “You have shot yo last arrow. That means that you ar o longer to live the life of an Indian. Yo are from this day forward to live th ife of the white man. But you may ke that arrow, it will be to you a sy bol of your noble race, and of the pri you feel that you come from the fir of all Americans.”

en calling the Indian again by his “v ite” name, Secretary Lane says to hi “Take in your hand this plow,” at e same time standing the aborigine in oper position behind the indicated ag ultural implement that is there fo hat purpose. As the Indian takes th plow handle, the Secretary says: “ is act means that you have chosen to ve the life of the white man—and th hite man lives by work. From the ea we all must get our living and the ea will not yield unless man pours up it the sweat of his brow. Only by wo do we gain a right to the land or to e enjoyment of life.”

llowing this ceremony, the Indian is esented with a leather purse, a sm l flag, and a golden-colored badge, th atter about the size of a quarter-of-dollar and bearing tho inscription: “ CITIZEN OF THE UNITED ST TES.” In the center of this badge is t miniature figure of an eagle bearing in s talons a draped American flag. It quite artistic in design and finish. Th Secretary follows tho presentation by epeating the following to each inc idual Indian, greeting each, as he do so, by his “white” name:

“ his purse will always say to you th the money you gain from your lab must be wisely kept. The wise ma saves his money so that when the sun does not smile and the grass does not grow, he will not starve.

“I give into your hands the flag of your country. This is the only flag you have ever had or ever will have. It is the flag of freedom, the flag of free men, the flag of a hundred million free men and women of whom you are now one. That flag has a request to make of you (calling the Indian by his “white” name): that you take it into your hands and repeat these words: ‘For as much as the President has said that I am worthy to be a citizen of the United States, I now promise this flag that I will give my hands, my head, and my heart to the doing of all that will make me a true American citizen.’

“And now beneath this flag I place upon your breast the emblem of your citizenship. Wear this badge of honour always; and may the eagle that is on it never see you do aught of which the flag will not be proud.”

At this conclusion the audience shouts its greeting to the new citizen, hailing him by his “white” name.

There is a similar ceremony attending tho recognition of the Indian women as citizens. When a woman, who has been adjudged competent to manage and control her own affairs, is called by her “white” name from among her associates, she is first tendered a workbag and purse which she holds in her hand. The Secretary, addressing her, says: “This means that you have chosen the life of the white woman—and the white woman loves her home. The family and the home are the foundation of our civilization. Upon the character and industry of the mother and homemaker largely depends the future of our Nation. The purse will always say to you that the money you gain from your labor must be wisely kept. The wise woman saves her money, so that when the sun does not smile and the grass does not grow, she and her children will not starve.” And the same message that accompanies the gift of the flag and badge to the men is repeated to the women. The ceremonies are concluded with the audience shouting the woman's “white” name and in extending congratulations.

Some of the Indians who are to be given their legal competency are presidents of banks; others are farmers of substance. The work of determining competency has been done by men who have been in the Indian Service for many years.

THE first meeting of the American Section of the World's Sunday School Association Executive Committee was held in Philadelphia April 27 and 28. The committee has recently been made more directly representative of the denominations by the addition of twelve representatives from the Foreign Missions Conference and six from the Sunday School Council of the Evangelical Denominations. Mr. H. J. Heinz is chairman of the American Committee. It was announced at this meeting that, although the date of the World's Sunday School Convention at Tokyo had been postponed until after the war, the Japanese Committee, of which Premier Okuma is chairman, had already raised $32,000 toward the expense of the convention, and the Y. M. C. A. building is being enlarged to accommodate 3,000 delegates.

Don't Throw Away 26 Extras

John W. Bate, the efficiency engineer, has created for us a model motor car plant.

It covers 45 acres. The buildings are new, all designed by Mr. Bate. They are equipped with 2092 up-to-date machines.

In the past six years, by investing $5,000,000, he has cut our factory costs in two.

Now 98 per cent. of this Mid-Year Mitchell is built in this model plant. It is built for much less than other factories could build it.

Get the Results

Part of the saving shows in the Mitchell price. No other car of this size, power and grade sells so low as this does.

Part of the saving pays for 26 extras, which other cars omit.

See these extras at your Mitchell showroom. Judge what they mean to you. Note how you would miss them.

All of them are wanted. But all are costly. And factories less efficient cannot afford to include them.

73 New Conceptions

In this Mid-Year Mitchell you will also find 73 new ideas. Each means added beauty, comfort or convenience.

We completed this model after the New York Shows. There our experts inspected 257 new designs, including all the latest creations from Europe and America.

All the best of these new styles are combined in this one car. So in this you will see the most complete car on exhibit.

The body design was voted the handsomest which appeared on any touring car. It is so striking—so impressive—that wherever it goes people stop to admire it.

Exclusive Values

This Mid-Year Mitchell is the only car with Bate cantilever springs. This makes it—as your dealer will prove—the easiest riding car in the world.

It is the only car in its class with oversize, ball-bearing steering parts. That makes it by far the easiest car to drive.

It holds, we believe, the endurance records. Six Mitchell cars have averaged 164,372 miles each. That's more than 30 years of ordinary service.

It is the only car with 440 drop forgings and steel stampings—tough and light—in place of heavy, brittle castings.

And it is the car which engineers select. Your dealer has a list of 37 noted engineers—men who stand at the top who have selected the Mitchell for their personal car.

Every man who keeps up on motor cars should inspect this Mid-Year Mitchell.

Gold's Coming Rival

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

CORDOVA is the copper center of Alaska. It is the terminus of the Copper River and Northwestern Railroad, which winds its way up the Copper River Valley and taps the great copper deposits that lie on the southern slopes of the Wrangell Range. The copper belt is over seventy miles long and twenty miles wide. It is one of the most extensive and richest of the copper areas of the world. More than 400 copper locations have already been made, and the wealth of the deposit is such that Alaska may become as noted for its copper as it is for gold today. The first trainload of ore that came down to this port contained metal to the value of more than $500,000, and that now on the wharves here is worth from $12,000 to $15,000 a carload. The ore is brought down in sacks as big as an ordinary pillow and of the weight of an average man. Each sack contains from 150 to 200 pounds of ore carrying $28 worth of copper. There are 600 sacks to the car, so that each carload is worth almost seventeen thousand dollars.

The copper of the Kennecott mines is so pure that it can be dug from the earth, turned into metal, and put on the market at a cost of about 5 cents a pound. In these days, when copper is worth from 20 cents upward, you can see that every pound means at least 15 cents profit. The average ores now being mined are about 20 per cent. pure, and a large part of them carry as high as 72 per cent. of copper. To show what this means the copper ores of Arizona yield about 5 per cent., Montana about 3 and Michigan less than 1.

THE copper output of Alaska is rapidly increasing. Its value last year was five times as great as in the year preceding, and was only two and one-half million dollars less than the total product of gold. In 1914 about twenty-one million pounds of copper were mined, and its value was less than three million dollars. In 1915 the output was over eighty million pounds, and its value was more than fourteen million dollars. The copper product will be even greater this year.

So far we have taken out of Alaska about eight dollars' worth of gold for every dollar's worth of copper. But our gold mining began thirty-six years ago, and our copper mining not until 1901. Today the prospecting for copper may be said to be at its beginning. There are extensive deposits of this metal on the other side of the Wrangell Mountains, and large working mines on some of the Alaskan islands. Seven mines are now being developed in the Ketchikan District of the islands of the Alexander Archipelago, and there are four mines on Prince William Sound. A number of copper locations have been made on the Kenai Peninsula, not far from the railroad, and on the south side of Turnagain Arm native copper has been sluiced down by the hydraulic miners. The copper of Prince of Wales Island carries considerable amounts of gold and silver, and the same is true of that of the Chitina district.

Cordova, the center of the copper industry

The word Chitina is of Indian origin. It is composed of two words, "chiti," meaning copper, and "na," meaning river. We know that native copper was used by the Copper River Indians before white men entered the territory. Spear and arrow heads of that metal made by them have been found in the sluice boxes of the miners, and ceremonial knives of copper are even now employed by the natives for cutting the salmon caught at the beginning of the season.

The Russians had discovered that copper existed in Alaska long before they sold the territory to us. They had nuggets of copper and small household utensils beaten out of the metal. They found no large deposits, however, and it was not until thirty-three or more years after we had taken possess n of the territory that there was any ope that the copper would be of great lue. It was in 1899 that prospectors o heir way from Prince William Sound the Klondike learned about the (per River region, and the same ye the geological survey reported a ilar copper belt on the northern side the Wrangell Mountains about two h red miles in a straight line from Fairl ks.

The most important discovery (opper in Alask and indeed one the most imp ant mining disc ries of the worl was that of the I necott mines, ich have since een bought b the Morgan-G genheim syn ate, and which a now yielding mo han 60,000,000 nds of pure co r a year. These posits were disc red by two ers, who were rospecting abou Kennecott Mo tain in the year 900, and the pr erty was then i estigated by Mr. Stephen A. rch, a young ing engineer, h o brought it the attention the capitalists a organized the velopment p ects which have made it one of the g test copper mines of the world.

DURING my stay at Cordova met Mr. Birch. He is the vice-pr dent and manager of the Kennecott perties, and thoroughly acquainte with their history and present condit . I asked him to tell me the story the discovery. He replied:

"It began with the rush to th londike, and the mining exciteme that followed it. There were then pros tors moving about here and there over aska and eleven of these men had m e an agreement to investigate certain s ions and to divide share and share e in what they found. prospect the land between Kennecott Glacier and Nikolas Creek, named after Chief Nikolai. They had gone only three miles when Warner sprained his ankle on one of the rocks. He sat down to rest and he and Smith there ate their lunch. As they did so, Smith observed a large green patch in the rocks on the side of the mountain and called Warner's attention to it. He said it looked strange and that they ought to go up and see just what it was. Warner replied that Smith might go if he would, he did not intend to climb up there to look at a sheep pasture. He thought the green patch was grass and that it was one of the feeding grounds of the mountain sheep that are often found on the hills of this part of Alaska.

"This objection of Warner discouraged Smith, and he was about to give up. He then went down to the creek to get some water for himself and Warner, and saw in the bed of the stream a piece of float or chip of mineral-bearing rock. He picked it out and took it back to Warner. They studied it together and then broke it in two. The first fracture had a silvery look, and they thought it was silver. They then went down to the creek to find more of the float. It increased as they walked up the stream, and gradually led them to the spot which they had thought was the sheep pasture. It proved to be the outcroppings of an enormous deposit of copper ore, and of the richest copper mine ever discovered.

"Now the first thing a prospector does after making a strike is to select a name for his find." Mr. Birch is still speaking. "The question was what they should call the new mine. Old Jack Smith, who was ahead of Warner and first saw the possibilities, turned to his partner and said: 'Warner, she's a bonanza.' To which Warner replied: 'Well, Jack, that's a good name for her. We'll call her "The Bonanza Mine."' The find proved to be a bonanza, and up to 1915, after only four and one-half years' operation, she had already yielded over $8,000,000 in dividends, and she is now earning at the rate of more than $6,000,000 per annum. No one knows the actual extent of the deposit, and it is safe to say that she will be paying dividends for generations to come."

"Are there other valuable deposits of copper in the vicinity of the Bonanza?"

"Yes, we have opened up the Jumbo mine, near by, which is a large producer, and there are many other copper prospects in the same region not belonging to us which will be producers in the near future. The Chitina copper belt is approximately seventy miles long and twenty miles wide and more than 400 locations have already been made. Many of these are in process of development, and some of them will soon be producing. If the region could have cheap transportation and if coal were available for the reduction of the ores at Cordova there would be a largely increased output in the near future."

"From what you say, Mr. Birch, it would seem that the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate does not own all the copper of Alaska."

"It certainly does not," replied Mr. Birch. "Its Alaska holdings are practically confined to those at Kennecott and on the island of Latouche. As I have told you, it has cost in the neighborhood of twenty-five million dollars to buy and develop the Kennecott properties. The Latouche properties are being handled in the most modern way. The policy which the government has pursued has retarded the development of the copper in this section by the prevention of the opening of the coal fields and the failure to furnish the transportation so much needed."

"What is the future of Alaska as regards copper?"

"It bids fair to be one of the largest copper-producing countries of the world. The product is now close to 100,000,000 pounds per annum, and this is almost one-twelfth of the total production of the United States. Nevertheless, it is only five years since copper has been turned out here in any appreciable quantity."

The story of the discovery of the Latouche copper mine is quite as interesting as that of the Bonanza. The tale was told me by an old prospector at Seward. Said he:

"The Latouche mine was the result of a mess of bad clams. A number of miners were sailing along the shores of Latouche Island when they found a clam bed and stopped and dug up enough for a meal. They cooked the clams, but before eating them found that they were deadly poisonous on account of the copperas in them. One of the men suggested that the copperas must come from copper deposits near by, and that they had better stop and prospect the rocks. They did so, and the result was the discovery of these great deposits of low-grade copper ore, which lie almost on the edge of the sea. The miners decided to develop the property for themselves, but the ore contained such a small percentage of copper that they could not make it pay. They kept on mining, however, with the idea that the deposits were so large that they ought to sell the property at a big price.

"In the meantime one of the miners, named Beatson, announced that he was disgusted and was going outside for the winter. He took some of the ore with him and went to New York, where he induced a rich relative to advance him $30,000 to purchase the mine, with the understanding that he, Beatson, was to retain his own share.

"Mr. Beatson then began to develop the property with the expectation of selling it. He opened up more of the mine and showed the extent of the deposits. He got one company to make an option for a considerable sum. They drove a shaft into the hill, but happened to strike between the ore vein, which was forked, and found nothing. The option expired and Beatson finally sold the mine to the Alaska Syndicate, which is now operating it at a profit. I have not learned what the price was, but I am told that it was high enough to drop Mr. Beatson into 'Easy Street' and to remove the necessity of his ever working thereafter."

Where Politeness Pays

UPON the introduction of automobiles into sunny Southern California, several years ago, there sprang up a general antagonism to them. In this feeling both the individual and the municipalities shared. It seemed that there was nothing that the cities would not do, within the law, in order that they might "hit" the auto and the auto owner. This condition was probably brought about by speeding and other unlawful acts on the part of a few drivers, for which offenses motor owners in general suffered.

But conditions have changed. Most of the cities and towns in Southern California are now making every effort to encourage automobiling. Quite remarkable signs, which support this statement, have made their appearance in many sections. "You will oblige us by driving slowly here; there is a school on this street," reads one such friendly notice. "Please drive slowly through our city," greets the traveler at one border line, and "Thank You," smiles on him as he leaves. There are many other signs of this nature, one of which we photographed at Azusa, a budding city lying about twenty-five miles northeast of Los Angeles, reading: "Attention, Motorists! Azusa speed limit, 14 and 25 miles per hour. A reasonable compliance will be appreciated. Azusa City Council and Auto Club of Southern California." The aim seems to be to request, rather than command, that the speed limit be observed and not broken. It has been learned for a truth that it is easier to lead than to drive the motorist, and it is being generally considered more desirable.

"Come Over into Macedonia and Help Us!"

International Sunday School Lesson for June 4.
Acts 15:36 to 16:15

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Come over into Macedonia, and help us!" Acts. 16:9.

The apostle knew much of the great heathen world of his time, its cities and temples, its political assemblies and religious festivals, its social customs and inward yearnings, its literature and spirit. He was well able, therefore, to read its heart, and focus in a single phrase its predominant passion. We may absolutely credit him as he tells us that the men of his time were groping in the darkness to find God, and were crying aloud for help. So heavily did this thought lie on him that it filled his dreams as well as his waking thoughts. As he walked to and fro on the shore or quay of Troas, and watched the garb or heard the speech of men from the great West who thronged the busy rt. it seemed to him that across the bri nt waters of the Ægean the cry for help pt coming. Each isle in the archip go caught it up and sent it on. Is it t be wondered at that, as he lay asleep i his humble room in the Ghetto inn, th ry seemed uttered by one of the Maced an sailors whom he had observed loadi an outgoing ship? It was as though the le of heaven were breathing on the sail nd wafting him on a predetermined and di e-ly purposed course. Will the time ever ne for us also when we shall be so filled th Christ's passion for souls that our n ht-dreams and day-plans shall be filled wi t?

The Gospel Reaches Europe

By Arthur H. Howland

NO one has ever been able to explain the pull of the North Star. It is one of the most uncanny, mysterious, inexplicable things in the world. Almost equally mysterious is the pull of the West upon the souls and minds of men. Civilization had its beginnings in the East, and has traveled westward step by step throughout the centuries. To-day's lesson marks one of the greatest epochs in this westward moving spirit-progress of mankind. It marks the time when Paul of Tarsus, the herald of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, heard in his soul the call of "the man of Macedonia," "Come over into Macedonia and help us," and set sail from Troy to Samothracia and to Philippi, thus passing with his message of salvation and social reconstruction from the continent of Asia to Europe.

Alas that the passing of these twenty centuries finds that region advanced so little on the real pathway of Christian brotherhood!

Again the geography and history of our lesson are intensely interesting. Ask one pupil to look up the history of Macedonia up to the outbreak of the first Balkan war four years ago.

Ask another pupil to look up the story of Philippi. Some scholars conjecture that Luke was a citizen of Philippi and that it may have been he himself who was the "man of Macedonia" whom Paul saw in his dream beckoning him to Europe. This conjecture probably grows chiefly out of the fact that it is just here in his narrative of the Acts that Luke begins to write in the first person.

THE coming of Doctor Lucas, a physician, with his friend Doctor Paul, the scholar, to the city of Philippi did not seem a great event in the city's history compared with the gigantic occurrences of other years; but it was in fact the greatest thing that had ever happened to the city since its foundation. We are to study next week the narrative of the jailer's conversion there. This week we take Paul only so far as to the house of the hospitable Lydia, who heard his preaching by the riverside and invited him to her home. We know that later there was a group of cheerful, generous Christians in the city, doubtless led by the households of Lydia and the jailer, and that to them Paul wrote his happiest and most affectionate epistle.

Before passing to the detailed study of the lesson from the beginning one other city should have special treatment in our geographical study. That is the city of Troy, or Troas.

IN earlier lessons we have spoken of the sharp contention of Paul and Barnabas over the question of taking John Mark with them on their second missionary journey. Our lesson begins with the narrative of this event, and shows the disciples parting company, Barnabas taking Mark and sailing for the island of Cyprus, and Paul choosing Silas, who had come to Antioc with himself and Barnabas on their turn from the council at Jerusalem Paul and Silas journeyed northward t ough Syria and Cilicia, "confirmi the churches." Paul wished to visi Derbe and Lystra, and evidently tc the short route from Antioch, p ably passing through his old home own, Tarsus, then around the Taurus ountain range to Derbe in Lycaoni

In one of these two towns h ound young Timothy, who was to e his companion and comforter for s nany years. It is pleasant to pictur aul's going to this happy househol vhere dwelt Eunice, Timothy's mothe Lois his grandmother, and his fath who was a Gentile, but probably so a Christian. It would be intere ng if we could know all the fluctua ns of friendship and companionship nong these three men, Mark, Timot an Paul. Mark evidently lost y rs Paul's friendship, while his pl wa taken by this young disciple o ye-onia. But Mark came back ag in close friendship with Paul. Ho close is indicated by the fact at writing his letter to the Colossia Paul speaks of Mark and three of h co panions as having been a "c for to him during his imprisonment.

We get a hint of the overrulin prov dence of God in the lives of his kers. Perhaps it was better for Mar to b separated from the powerful sona influence of Paul.

THERE are many lessons fo oun Christians in today's stud B think of this in particular. P bably Timothy had no idea that he as t be chosen as a companion and ly o the great apostle Paul. He mpl lived a glad, pure, faithful lif n his own home town, and labored h e and in neighboring cities for the osp which he loved. But he mu hav been an unusually attractive a consistent sort of a Christian, f Luk specifies that he was "well rep ed by the brethren who were at ys ra and Iconium." Because he ha live his life so purely and done his rk well in this limited field, Pa take him up and leads him on with msel to broader and higher tasks.

They perfected the organiza on the churches which had been read founded, and presented the isio which had been made at Jerusa n f the conduct of Gentile Christia Th churches were "established in t fai and increased in number daily. Th history of every church and ev y d nomination ought to read like th with out a break from year to year sta lished in the faith, and increa g number daily.

Now come some strange erse showing how the plans of the co secrated men conflicted with t pla of the Holy Spirit, and showi ho careful, how insistent, how reef the Holy Spirit was in leadi the along the path that would br g th best results. He told them pt preach in Asia; he forbade the to g into Bithynia. He allowed them to go to Troy; and it was here that they received the loud, clear call to come to Macedonia. Every Christian life has periods like this. There are times of uncertainty, of perplexity. Plans are formed that do not seem to work out well. Strange hindrances arise; strange inward restraints are felt; we are anxious to do the right thing, yet uncertain what to do. During these times we go on, following our best judgment, allowing circumstances to control, doing what we can here and there, in Phrygia, in Galatia, in Mysia, at Troas—when suddenly comes a great illumination, a clear call. We know we are on the right track after all, and the ripened fields of Macedonia spread before us, awaiting our coming and our participation in the abundant harvest.

Another Chance

A Thought for Girls

"SO Barnabas took Mark, and sailed unto Cyprus." Barnabas was a hard-working man, and Mark had proved that he was almost a quitter; had proved that he loved home comforts and luxury—that he could not endure the hardships and trials and the very real dangers of carrying God's message. He had proved that he cared more for comfort than for sacrifice. And yet Barnabas, knowing that under the shell of too much civilization, under the veneer of custom and tradition, there might be something really firm and great in the boy, was willing to give Mark another chance. It is said that Mark, "under the leadership of his uncle, developed into a seasoned worker, whom Paul took again to his heart." And yet if Barnabas had refused to give Mark another chance he might have stayed home steeped in comforts and amusements until his really fine mind and soul had been swept away.

I once heard of a young girl who was taken to court for stealing. It was a first offense, but the judge—in front of a crowded courtroom—told her that she was incorrigible, that she was a bad girl. And he sentenced her to a short term that was just long enough to rob her of the greatest of her possessions—self-respect. After her sentence was over the girl disappeared until years after, when she was found by a kind settlement worker, broken of heart, and soul, and spirit.

"I was not a bad girl naturally," she said sullenly on being questioned. "I was just weak once—and so I stole. If any one had given me a bit of hope I would have tried over again, but every one was sure that I was bad and no one wanted to give me a second chance."

By giving Mark a second chance Barnabas helped a soul to find its place—helped an otherwise obscure man to be great. You may be able to do the same by reversing an unfavorable first impression and stretching out a helping hand. And don't stop at a second chance. Keep giving new chances until, by your faith, you have helped some weaker mind, some less aggressive spirit, to find the light.

The Call of the West

A Thought for Boys

IN the days of 1849 at any ford of the Missouri River might have been seen day after day groups of men bound west. Their big covered wagons made a steady procession across the rolling plains of Nebraska and through the rough mountains and desert wastes to the westward. On many a wagon was painted the legend "California or bust." They were the Forty-niners, lured on and on through Indian country over scarcely broken trails, across Death Valley on to the country of gold. In the middle 50's, now and then a worn and sorry looking crew would return, and now and then the legend on the wagon top would be just "Busted." There had been wealth untold in California, but not enough to go around.

Paul and Barnabas and Luke and Silas and Timothy heard a call of the west, too, but they did not seek riches. They carried with them the great treasure that is inexhaustible, the knowledge of the love of God. As the pioneers of '49 founded and formed the civilization of the Pacific coast, so these pioneers who went over into Macedonia set the molds for the civilization of Christendom. Let your boys see that the call of the west is the call of the ages. Let them see, through your eyes, the never ceasing struggle of the race of men, forward, westward to liberty and to newly ordered life. Let them see that it is the pioneer spirit, the spirit that can hear the call of the west, and that can laugh at dangers, and that can dare peril to do its worst, that carries mankind onward, and that makes life worth while and gives it meaning. But make them see that the greatest pioneer is the pioneer of the cross. Tell them the story of the Oregon trail and of the missionary who saved Oregon for the Union.

border face probably twice as many well-equipped Mexicans. But it is no secret that the available regulars in the United States proper are practically all now on service either at or below the Mexican frontier. The censorship, however, is very strict, and exact information as to the disposition of American troops in Mexico is not available.

The conferences between Generals Scott, Funston and Obregon terminated May 11 in a failure to come to an agreement, and the questions at issue were referred back to the governments of the two countries. The stumbling-stone appears to be the demand of the Carranza government that the American forces be withdrawn entirely from Mexico by an early fixed date. With the failure of the conferences, renewal of raids across the border, the precarious situation of General Pershing's command 250 miles south of the line, the reputed intention of General Funston to call for additional reinforcements, and the determined position of the Administration at Washington to follow its own course in protecting the border and stamping out banditry in Mexico, increased the general feeling that intervention might be close at hand.

But everything seemed to simmer down suddenly, for on May 13 it was unofficially announced that under an oral agreement between Generals Scott and Obregon the armed forces of the respective governments would actually cooperate for a common purpose. This is the latest news available at the time of going to press, and like all the news about Mexico during the last three years, it is subject to great changes at at any moment.

oversea dominions were in sufficient strength to enable enough to be transported to the western line to take over a portion of that front.

It also indicates one of two things in regard to this western line; either that the German pressure on the Allied forces, and not at Verdun alone, is so great that it is imperatively necessary to strengthen that line; or that at last the Allies are hurrying forward all the troops on which they can lay hands preparatory to a grand effort to force their lines northward from the positions occupied practically ever since the battle of the Marne.

On the western line the battle of Verdun is again in full fury, with particular violence around Hill No. 304 on the western front of the stronghold. On Sunday, as reported last week, the Germans drove the beginning of a wedge between Hill No. 304 and Le Mort Homme hill to the east, and penetrated the underground passageways between the two hills and captured about 1,300 French. This is the first time that the underground defenses of the Verdun area have been mentioned in the bulletins. The evident object of this effort is to isolate Hill 304, the most important defensive position on the western front, and to make of it a salient attackable on three sides, two of which sides are already in possession of the Germans.

The French had about twenty observation balloons torn away from their moorings behind their lines by a sudden squall on Saturday, a number of which were blown over to the German lines, carrying some of their observers with them, other observers escaping by the use of parachutes.

On Monday, May 8, the fighting continued fast and furious both on the western and northern fronts. The French in the morning made an attack on the positions between Hill No. 304 and Le Mort Homme, taken by the Germans the day before, and succeeded in recovering a small portion of these gains, capturing a handful of prisoners in so doing.

In the afternoon the Germans again bombarded with violence the whole of Hill No. 304, and made an infantry attack on the French positions on Hill No. 287, the hill immediately to the west of Hill No. 304, which did not meet with a great measure of success.

Monday night and Tuesday the Germans launched three separate attacks against the French positions on the west front. The first of these, which was directed on the Termiten hill, south of Haucourt, was successful to a degree and the French lost several trenches. The second attack was on the wood just to the west of Hill No. 304, and this the French succeeded in repulsing; while the third was against the French trenches to the northeast of this hill. It will be noted that all this fighting was either on Hill No. 304 or on ground abutting thereon.

While on Wednesday the infantry fighting on the northern front was perhaps not as severe as that of the day before, still ther as plenty of it. On the west front the Ger ns, according to the French, made a strong at k, after a violent bombardment on the F ch trenches near Hill No. 287, to the west o he important Hill No. 304, and were comp ely repulsed. The French claim a further all advantage on the slopes west of Le ort Homme, wherein they captured parts of a erman trench, took sixty-two prisoners, and ossessed themselves of two machine guns. O he other hand, the Germans have improved eir positions on Hill No. 304 and are now str gly holding practically the northern slope o his hill. On Thursday there was a hard fig in the Fort Vaux region wherein neither de gained the advantage, though both side ost heavily. The artillery activity continu on all the fronts.

THE aftermath of the exchange of tes between the American and Ge an governments on the submarine questio s a supplementary German note admitting responsibility for the sinking of the S ex, making due apology and offers of ade ate indemnity for the loss of American lives nd announcing the punishment of the comm der of the submarine. The general belief n is that no breach with Germany could po ly be justified by anything that has occ ed, and that the German government ha aid its submarine commanders under instru ons that will prevent the recurrence of subn ine attacks contrary to international law.

What Congress Thinks About A ed Merchantmen

IN the great debate in Congress in ebruary and March last on the ied merchantman issue, senators and rep entatives went on record against the Ad histration in making an issue of the ri of Americans to sail on ships of the bellig nts during the progress of this war, in sp hes which went almost wholly unnoticed the press. An amazing compilation of ese speeches, concerning which the publi was kept wholly uninformed, has been mad om the Congressional Record by William B ard Hale and published under the title of " ace or War?" We think this is a document ich every American citizen would do w to study. We are glad to mention it here ely, and to direct our readers where the cument can be obtained at the price of on lollar, doubtless with postage added. The Greater Patriotism

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE first Decoration Day that I remember was a blue-and-gold day—the sort of day when Spring and Summer clasp hands and greet each other softly. I remember how school was closed and we children went out in the morning early, oh, very early, to pick daisies and buttercups and sweet clover blossoms. Some of us had rose bushes in our gardens. We stripped these of all their blossoms, which we made into fragrant little bouquets. And then, after our small hands were tired with much breaking of tough stems and after our little backs were aching with much stooping over very short plants, we went back home and were washed clean, and dressed in stiffly starched white frocks, and curled—if we had curly hair. And then, with our arms full of blossoms, we stood on the corner and watched the parade go by.

It was not a very large parade, this first Decoration Day parade that I can remember, but it was a very impressive one. We had fourteen Grand Army men and one Confederate soldier in our little town. These men walked in single file—except two very feeble ones who rode in a carriage. Before them walked the high school band—very big boys they seemed then—and behind them came the local police, the fire department, and various important personages—mayors, for instance—who rode in their own flower-filled carriages, and looked vastly important.

I can still—I will always—remember my thrill of excitement and patriotism as I saw the veterans—white-haired, some of them, others with empty sleeves and scarred faces and halting feet—march past to the tune of some patriotic song. I felt at that time that the greatest honor in the world would be the honor of growing old for one's country, of losing an arm or a leg or an eye for the sake of the flag. I remember how a strange feeling clutched at my throat; how a chill ran up my spine, how I held my little friend's hand tight—oh, so tight. It was my first big emotion in regard to my country and the heroes of my country.

NOT long ago I attended a different sort of a patriotic celebration. It was held in a church far down on the East Side of New York, a church set like a jewel in the dull copper of the slums. It is called "The Church of All Nations," because folk of every nationality worship there.

I wonder how many of you have ever seen a great mixed company of men and women, girls and boys, who are all foreigners, talking different languages and thinking different thoughts? Down at "The Church of All Nations" at that patriotic celebation I saw Russians, Italians, Germans, French, Hungarians and Chinese sitting side by side. Their voices rose in hushed expectancy, some in dull guttural tones, others in the soft liquid notes of the southland.

There was a stage in the front of the meeting room—a stage mysteriously curtained from the eyes of the waiting public. Dr. Henry, the pastor of the church, stood in front of the curtain and made a simple speech of welcome—so simple that any one who comprehended a small bit of English could understand what he was saying. And then the curtain rolled back quietly from the stage and the entertainment began.

It was not a very elaborate entertainment, but as one watched the Chinese and Italian and Russian actors, one felt a sudden stir of wonder that these foreigners had been taught to speak so well and with such feeling and expression. The last tableau was perhaps the best of all to that enthusiastic audience. It was a tableau in which one girl was the Goddess of Liberty and thirteen girls, all of different nationalities, represented the thirteen original states. In front of the thirteen girls stood ten smaller girls, dressed in white with American flags draped over their shoulders. There was one girl standing near the middle in a Scotch Highland costume, and near the end, on each side, stood some of the members of a Chinese Boy Scout company. In the exact center of the whole group, a tiny Chinese girl was poised with outstretched arms. Although she was only a tot of three, she entered into the spirit of the thing with great joy and with great pride. For her dress was white, and she had little white wings fastened on her shoulder and a small white crown upon her head. "Peace" was printed in silver letters on a ribbon that crossed her chest.

The audience looked, in perfect delight, at the tableau. And then suddenly they were cheering—cheering our flag and our land. They were cheering for Peace—and some of their relatives were dying in the midst of war. And then, all at once, somebody started to sing the "Star Spangled Banner."

There were Russians in that group, and Italians and Germans and Hungarians and Chinese. Some of them did not know our English language. But every one of them seemed to know the words of our national anthem, and the words came as if they were drawn from the depths of each untaught heart. And as they sang I felt a great stir of patriotism and emotion—a great stir of love for my country and for these people who were to become my countrymen. I felt almost a greater feeling of patriotism than I felt when I watched the parade of old soldiers, marching slowly past the corner where I stood, a small child, with blossoms in my hand.

IT'S a great thing to have a "Decoration Day" when we may do reverence to our soldier dead, when we may salute our flag and cheer our veterans. But it's a greater thing to have a day when we may instil a love of country into the hearts of our new Americans who will some day be citizens.

We Americans, born in the United States, have an inborn feeling of patriotism that makes it hard for us to understand how any one could not love our land with a deep and lasting love. But there are little aliens in every city in this country, who do not know what the Fourth of July, or Memorial Day, or even patriotism itself may mean. Ours is the sacred privilege not only to decorate the graves of our soldier dead, not only to reverence our brave heroes, but to teach alien hearts to be patriotic hearts that can thrill at the sight of our flag, and cheer at the music of our national song.

DOCTOR LEARNED

The Power of Pure Food

Sometimes a physician who has exhausted medical skill on his own case finds that he has to look to pure food for help. Such was the experience of a Southern physician who has spent a great many years in his profession.

"The services of my life-time," he says, "have been to try to better mankind—to help them preserve health, and to regain it when lost. So it is with great pleasure I recall my first introduction to Grape-Nuts.

"I had never investigated this food until I came to use it in my own case. I had tried to heal myself and had had the services of other prominent physicians. Then I clutched at Grape-Nuts as a drowning man clutches at a straw.

"To my gratification I found that I had discovered something besides a broken reed to lean upon, for the food began to recuperate me immediately, and it helped me to such an extent that I eat anything that I desire, and do so without distress.

"I have not only found a good friend in sickness, but a most delicious dish as well. It is the most nutritious article of diet I have ever found and I notice its splendid effects more particularly at night time, for a saucer of Grape-Nuts and milk is followed by a most refreshing sleep and perfect awakening.

"My only regret is that I was so slow to look into the scientific merits of this wonderful food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

What the Grocer Did for Johnny's Mother

"Oh Johnny," called his mother, "hurry and run to the store for a cake of soap. I've used every bit and my wash is not half done. You can get your lunch when you come back." "What kind of soap?" asked Johnny. "Oh any kind will do," said his mother.

"Hullo, young man," said the grocer. "You want some soap? Mother say what kind? Well, then, I'm going to send her the kind my wife uses—Fels-Naptha. She won't have any other—says it's the greatest soap made and that it cuts her work in half. Tell your mother to read the directions on the Red and Green wrapper."

This is a picture of Johnny's mother doing her washing the different, easy, Fels-Naptha way.

"I never used this soap before," said Johnny's Mother, to Johnny's Father that evening. "But it certainly is fine! It took me all morning to do half my washing, but it only took a little over an hour to finish it after I got Fels-Naptha Soap to work on it. I just soaked the clothes 30 minutes," continued Johnny's Mother, "and when I came to wash them the dirt rolled right out without any hard rubbing or boiling. It's quick and it's easy to do your work with that kind of soap. I'll never be without it."

Fels-Naptha is the perfect combination of soap, with that wonderful cleanser—naptha. It really does all your work for you and saves you time and strength. Washes clothes perfectly, easily and quickly without hard rubbing or boiling. It's just as good for all kinds of soap-and-water housework.

What the Bible Picture Contest Will Mean to You is told in these letters from Christian Herald readers—just a very few of the thousands we have received. If only you were competing you would feel as they do. Start right now; you'll have ample time to solve the pictures—until July 17.

Has Gained An Abiding Treasure

"I want you to know how much I am enjoying the Contest pictures. I am so sorry that the last one has appeared. When I finally get a picture matched up, the fitting Bible verse is written or rather engraved on my heart. You could have offered us no line of work (if work it is) that would have been more instructive. It seems as though you had selected the cream of the Bible. Can you not continue the Contest? I am not speaking from a prize standpoint, as I do not positively expect to be a winner; yet I am doing my best and gleaning treasures that are abiding."—Mrs. G. R. S., New Jersey.

Hundreds of Letters in a Nutshell

Here, as though it were one letter from a contestant, is the inspiring substance of many actual letters.

"It seems to me that you have made a great mistake in the announcement of the prizes in the Bible Picture Contest. You say that the first prize will be $1,250.00. Now I am very sure that that is a double misstatement. The first prize is not $1,250.00, nor is the first prize something that 'is to be.' The first prize has already been won by me. It is mine and your judges cannot possibly take it away from me by any decision they may make. It is mine, and I am going to keep it.

"I don't know whether you intended this, that I have won as the first prize, or not, but knowing the Christian Herald so well, I really think that you did so intend it, and I certainly am more than grateful that the opportunity to win it came my way. If I now win the second, or any other prize that comes after that, well and good. But in any case I shall always have the first great prize of this truly great contest in the wonderful familiarity which I have acquired with the passages from the Bible which appear in the 'Gems.'

"And not only that, but this contest sent me again and again to the Bible with a thoroughness of attention that I never exercised before."

So Much to Be Found in the Pictures

"I have been studying these pictures all winter and find it very interesting. I love the Bible and have been a student all my life, and I thought I had the Bible almost committed to memory, but these pictures have been the means of my finding so many beautiful and interesting truths, such precious promises, such tender tales of love and sacrifice, so much wonderful power and glory given to those who will love God and do His holy will. As I grow older the precious Bible grows dearer to me."—Mrs. A. M. C., Virginia.

Bible Above Silver and Gold

"I do not look for a sure prize in money, and still I may receive the greatest prize of all—increased knowledge of my Book, which indeed is worth more than silver or gold; for I am afraid—yes, and ashamed—to say I have not read it as I should in the past few years. I thank you for the privilege of turning back to it with more thought and care than ever before.'—Mrs. E. E. W., New Jersey.

Calls Our Contest Plan Inspired

"The Contest far exceeds all manner of games. For those who must be amused, it furnishes an entirely new parlor diversion. For the brainy who delight in the intellectual feats of chess, it surely supplies a triumphant rival. For the earnest follower of Christ it borders the path of Bible research with delights. Surely it was not invention but inspiration that conceived this plan. How blessed of God is the one to whom it was vouchsafed! Thus may we all be encouraged to seek new avenues of usefulness."—M. M. B., Missionary to the Japanese. California.

Sufficient Gain Even If No Prize

"I take occasion to express my appreciation of your Contest pictures. From No. 1 to No. 60 each becomes more interesting than the other. And if I am not fortunate enough to gain one of the prizes, I feel I am gaining much in interest and love for my Bible. I, for one, wish that you might continue a picture department in your publication after this Contest is over. I find it very instructive."—Mrs. L. J. B., Florida.

"Doubly Repaid by the Bible Knowledge Gained"

"I write to tell you how very much I am enjoying the Bible Picture Contest. Have always been a Bible reader, but naturally have read it with more interest since I became one of the contestants, hoping for a share in the reward to help build our church. But I feel that I am doubly repaid by the Bible knowledge I have gained, should I not be so fortunate. I have told numbers of people about the Contest, and how interesting it is."—M. W. T., North Carolina.

Contest Benefit a Vast Reward

"I wish to join the large number who are lauding the Bible Picture Contest, for I certainly think it grand. Husband and I believe that the benefit derived from the study of the Bible, while searching for fitting answers for the pictures, is a vast reward if no other were offered. In regard to the Christian Herald, we think it wonderfully fitted to be in every Christian home; for, among its many blessings and inspirations, it may hel to draw and keep the dea children in the straight and narrow way."—Mrs. L. D. Tennessee.

Thankful, Regardless of Reward

"I am seventy years old and am getting lots of good in the Bible Picture Contest, prize or no prize."—Mrs. E. G., Idaho.

Wants Feature Made Permanent

"What a fine feature the Contest is! Wouldn't it be a good idea to make it permanent—say one picture a week—after the Contest is over?"—Miss M. M. H., Massachusetts.

"Gems" Found Indispensable

"I would like to tell you how much I am enjoying the Bible Picture Contest. While the pictures were being published, I looked forward with pleasure each week to the arrival of the Christian Herald; and I appreciate your little book 'Gems from the Bible' so much—it is such a help! I don't see how any one can do without it in the Contest. I have spoken to several friends about your excellent paper, which my husband and I have been taking for twenty years.—Mrs. C. G. H., South Carolina.

"I want to write you a little note and tell you how we enjoyed your Bible Picture Contest. I am sorry you cannot keep the pictures in the paper all the time. I think it is a fine pastime, and I enjoy the hard ones the best of all. If you have one next year put in more of those. Hope you can continue to have one Contest a year, at least, on the Bible. I have the answers nearly all ready, and have enjoyed it so much."—Miss L. G. K., Ohio.

Amply Rewarded

"The research in the Bible is worth a great deal, even if I do not get a prize, but I would like that too if entitled to it."—C. I. G., New Jersey.

"Gems" Rightly Named

"I am enjoying very much working out the pictures. The 'Gems from the Bible is rightly named. It makes it so easy to find favorit passages."—W. D. D., Connecticut.

Duties of the Judges and How Answers Will Be Checked

While you may forward your Reply Book (set of answers) on or after June 19, 1916, we shall keep putting the sets aside until after the closing date of July 17, 1916, which is the final date for mailing in sets of answers.

From the time of receipt, through the various checking, and judging, and recording processes, all sets of answers will be scrupulously guarded, and a corps of picked employees, under a competent director, will check them.

Sets of answers will be checked to ascertain all the different verses submitted for each picture. Finally a list will have been made up, containing every individual answer located.

This list of submitted answers, irrespective of who submitted them, will be laid before the Committee of Judges, and each Judge will be given a reprint of the Rules of the Contest and a set of pictures, identical copies of those published. The Judges will not know what was in the mind of the artist who drew the pictures. The Committee's only care will be to judge the appropriateness of the answers to the pictures, according to the Rules.

When the Committee of Judges has completed its deliberations, that body will turn over to us a list of supremely fitting (or winning) answers approved by them as such. This final list of the best answers submitted will be handed by us in turn (the list being signed by the Judges) to the accounting director and his staff for the latter to use as the criterion in now marking the sets of answers in their keeping.

Whichever set of answers is now found to contain the correct or winning answer for picture No. 1 will be given credit for one correct answer. If the Judges approve two equally superior answers for picture No. 1, whichever set of answers contains either of the two will be given credit for one correct answer; and if a set of answers contains both correct answers, credit will be given for two correct answers. The same principle will be applied to the case of the answers for each of the sixty pictures. The sets of answers will eventually be marked as having forty correct, fifty-five correct, sixty correct, sixty-two correct, or whatever the case may be.

In the event of equality among contestants on these marks, the further tests will be applied, as explained in the Rules. In the end, the highest ranking contestants will receive the rewards; and if there are any final ties, then every tying contestant will receive the full reward tied for, that is, the prizes announced would be increased so as to give each winner the full reward won.

Contestants MUST NOT Under Any Circumstances Write to the Judges.

NOT THE SIMPLE LIFE.—Little Dorothy had acquired a fixed habit of eating Sunday dinner with her two old and beloved friends, the Browns, who lived just across the street. Coming home she found her own family seated at their table enjoying a substantial but plain dinner. A slight wave of contempt crossed her face.

"Why, what did you have for dinner?" her mother asked.

"Baked chicken, rice, hot biscuits, mashed potatoes, candied sweet potatoes, cranberries, plum jelly and other delinquencies—" loftily asserted the little maid.

AN IMPETUOUS (?) SWAIN.—They had been engaged to be married fifteen years, and still he had not mustered courage enough to ask her to name the happy day. One evening he called in a peculiar frame of mind, and asked her to sing something tender and touching, something that would move him. She sat down at the piano and sang, "Darling, I Am Growing Old."

SHOULD HAVE SOLD HIM A TELESCOPE.—A commercial traveler went into a country store in a far backwoods district one pleasant spring day recently. After securing his order he remarked to the proprietor that they were having a great time over in Europe. "That so?" said the man. "Why, yes, a great fight," exclaimed the commercial man. "Well, they've got a good day fer it, ain't they?" was the reply.

AN OLD MODEL NEEDED.—"Your dad is an old crank," said the youth, who had been told by her father that eleven o'clock was time to go.

Dad overheard the remark. "A crank is necessary in case of the lack of a self-starter," he retorted.

SLOW OF SPEECH.—The new missionary had been three months on the field and was still struggling with the language. One day some natives called on her and, finding she could not speak freely in their native tongue, after having been so long on the field, one of them said impatiently, "My, but you Americans are slow. I should think you would be ashamed of yourselves. Why, in our country even the smallest child—yes, even a babe of two years—can speak the language."

MAKING PROGRESS.—"Hurry, Tommy!" called mamma; "we're late. Are your shoes on?" "Yes, mamma, all but one!"

SHOULD HAVE STAYED ON WHEN HE GOT OFF.—An Irishman got out of his car for refreshments at a railway station, but the bell rang, and the train left before he had finished his repast.

"Hould on!" cried Pat, as he ran like a madman after the train. "Hould on, ye murderin' ould stame ingine—ye've got a passenger on board that's left behind!"—Epworth Herald.

The Correspondence of Professor David Smith, D.D.

A YOUNG friend has lately lost her husband under very trying circumstances—an operation which was unsuccessful. Both surgeon and physician told her he could only live a few days, but strictly forbade her to let him know, and enjoined the necessity of being bright and pretending to him that he would recover. She acted the part successfully, but just as he was dying, he seemed suddenly to realize that he was passing away, and beckoned to her to kiss him, and, without any loving farewell, he was gone. Of course she has collapsed mentally, or rather emotionally. She is almost constantly lamenting that she was debarred from speaking to him about the momentous change. He was a Christian, lived a consistent, unassuming life, but did not speak of spiritual matters.—H.

IT is natural that your friend should be distressed and vex herself with misgivings whether she has acted rightly. It is always so in such cases; and the fitting consolation for her is an emphatic assurance that she acted rightly, and had she acted otherwise she would then have had reason for self-reproach. The determining fact is that she obeyed the mandate of the two doctors, and this was her absolute and imperative duty. What their reason may have been I do not know; but they certainly had a sufficient reason. Probably it was the necessity of mental repose, and it was compliance with their instructions that secured her husband the precious mercy of an easy dissolution. She should thank God that she was granted grace to obey their counsel. Had she disregarded it, she would probably now have had just cause for self-reproach, remembering the suffering which she entailed on her husband.

Apparently she is vexing herself with two considerations: (1) The moral question whether she has not been guilty of untruth in "being bright and pretending to him that he would recover." This opens a large question of casuistry which I cannot now discuss. Suffice it to say that ethical precepts are never more than working rules, and circumstances continually emerge where obedience to a specific precept would involve positive wrong. Your friend's case is an instance. There is instruction for her in the example of that gracious Roman lady, Arria. Her husband, Cæcinna Pætus, and their darling child were both sick. The son died, and she concealed his death from her husband. She attended the funeral without his knowledge; and whenever he asked how the boy was, she would answer that he was better. And when he asked what he was doing, she would answer, "He is sound asleep." When her tears could not be restrained, she would quit the chamber and abandon herself to grief, and then dry her eyes and return with composed face.

(2) Your friend is troubled because she had no converse with her husband ere he died regarding his interest in Christ; but why should she deem this necessary? He was a Christian, and he had no need to "make his peace with God" in the closing hour. Her misgiving is dishonoring alike to her husband's faith and to the Saviour's faithfulness. Has it never occurred to you at New Year's time how good it is, when one has no need to make resolutions of amendment, and desires only to carry the old faith and love into the future? And so it should be at the hour of death. How would you feel if it were revealed to you on waking that you would die tomorrow? If you are right with God, you would face your one remaining day with a quiet heart, doing the old duties in the old way, loving and serving for one day more. DAVID SMITH.

New Lubricant resists heat-prevents rapid formatio of solid matter in your crank case

High temperatures in your automobile engine turn a large part of ordinary oil into black solid matter —your car's greatest enemy. This new lubricant prevents rapid sedimentation, protects metal surfaces, reduces expense.

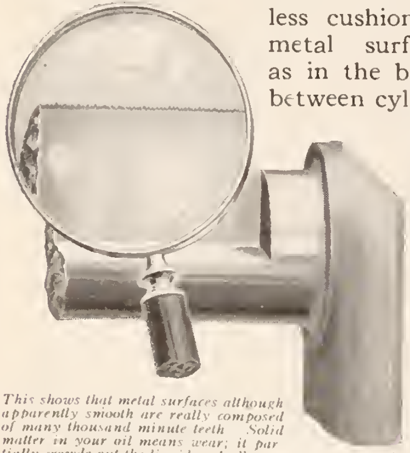
Ordinary oils break down under the terrific heat of an automobile engine after a few hours' use. A large part of the oil forms black sediment.

The sediment is destroyed oil—heat has killed all lubricating value in it.

Solid matter in your oil means wear in your engine.

The polished surfaces of bearings and cylinder walls appear smooth to the naked eye, but a magnifying glass will show you that even the finest surfaces are rough and consist of sharp points and depressions.

When the microscopic teeth of these surfaces are rubbed together they are broken off—worn down. The thin film of oil which forms a nearly frictionless cushion between metal surfaces—such as in the bearings, or between cylinder walls and pistons—is all that prevents your motor from seizing and destruction. As long as the film of oil thoroughly covers the metal-to-metal surfaces, the motor will run without excessive wear, but as soon as the oil is turned into solid matter the microscopic teeth begin to grind, and friction, the greatest enemy of your engine, does its deadly work.



This shows that metal surfaces although apparently smooth are really composed of many thousand minute teeth. Solid matter in your oil means wear; it partially crowds out the liquid and allows over six hundred square inches of metal surfaces to grind together.

How Solid Matter Damages Your Car

The black solid matter formed by ordinary oils prevents the liquid from reaching the friction points where it is needed. This does not mean that the sediment clogs the pumps or pipes, although that trouble may occur. It means that the sediment which is inactive or negative partially crowds out the remaining liquid oil. This under-supply of oil causes friction—heat—seizing—wear—loss of power and expensive repairs.

Automobile engineers state that from 50% to 75% of repairs and fully 50% of depreciation are due to improper lubrication.

Relative Oil Destruction

The contents of the two bottles shown illustrate clearly the relative durability of ordinary oil and of Veedol, the new lubricant that resists heat. Veedol deposits only a small fraction as much sediment as ordinary oil.

Ordinary oils are unstable and therefore unserviceable because of non-heat-resisting chemical structure.

Special processes of manufacture developed by this company and the use of Pennsylvania paraffine-base crude oil give Veedol, the new lubricant, its unusual chemical structure, and its remarkable heat-resisting ability.

Make this Road Test

Remove the drain plug from the lowest part of your motor crank case and allow all old oil to run out. Replace the plug, fill the sump up to correct oil level with kerosene and run the motor slowly under its own power for about thirty seconds, to cleanse the interior. Then draw out all kerosene, replace the drain plug and refill with Veedol.

The exact amount of fuel and oil in the car should be recorded and a reading of the speedometer taken before starting. Then let a test be run over a familiar road, including steep hills and straight level stretches, for any distance up to five hundred miles or more.

You will find that your motor has acquired new pick-up and hill-climbing ability, due to the maximum mechanical efficiency made possible through Veedol.

You will find your mileage on both gasoline and oil increases. You will reduce your carbon trouble. Your motor will have more power.

What it Means in Actual Savi

The average mileage of all cars is c ceded to be 6000 miles per year and the ann cost of operating the typical or average is estimated by an expert statistician

Solid matter in your oil means fricti and wear; friction and wear mean expense; expe matter formed by the oil.

Veedol prevents rapid sedimentation and saves real money on these items of expense. The reco

Questions and Answers

A. M., Battle Creek, Mich. 1. Did the death of Christ affect the salvation of the righteous men of Old Testament times? If not, what was their faith? 2. If Christ was the first-born from the dead, how can the presence of Moses at the Transfiguration be accounted for?

1. We have positive assurance from Scripture that many persons in Old Testament times found salvation. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews gives a long list of Old Testament characters who won a high place spiritually and a high reward. The best answer to the question as to the relation of the death of Christ to those Old Testament saints is that they saw and understood beforehand the revelation of the love and grace of God which was to be made plain later to all the world on Calvary. The sacrifices of the Jewish law revealed the sinfulness of sin and the need of atonement. Many souls under the old dispensation saw these truths, truly repented of their sin and trusted God's forgiving grace. As we have stated before, however, there is a sweetness and richness in the experience of those who trust the power of Christ's death on the cross which those could never have had who did not know that he had died for them. 2. The same answer applies to your second question. Jesus himself insisted that the Old Testament saints had triumphed over death and were still alive (Mark 12: 27). Although Elijah is stated to have passed to the other world without going through the experience of death, it is clearly stated that Moses died (Deut. 34: 5). And both these men appeared with Jesus at the Transfiguration. But the experience of going through death hand in hand with Christ, triumphing over the grave as a sharer in the power of his resurrection, is something new and different. In this sense Christ was the first-born, the leader of that long line of happy souls who were to find victory over death because they had already, by faith in his cross, found victory over sin.

H. W., Ohio. You should ask divine help to bear your cross, and it will become a blessing to you. The world is not a forgiving world, but it will respect those who strive to live right and to help others. You say you have the assurance of divine forgiveness. Get in touch with some good Christian who will understand you and help you, and if you are faithful and earnest a way will be opened to let you back into fellowship. Don't be impatient; just be content to await the opportunity.

"How should the children spend Sunday?" is a question that is debated in many homes. "I would like to ask your readers," writes A. H. D., Etiwanda, Calif., "who have had experience with children on the Lord's day to tell about it. We have six children in the family. They attend Sunday school in the morning, and in the afternoon we take them for a walk or read to them. They spend part of the time at the piano, but still are so full of life that they are quite noisy, and often hurt one another, so that much of our time is taken up in watching out for them. We cannot seem to supply the demand for amusement suitable to the Lord's day."

A. G., Maysville, Mo., writes of a singular discovery in the locality in which he lives. A man died twelve years ago and was buried on the farm. Recently the body was disinterred and removed to Fairport Cemetery. It seemed to have been petrified. The man, while living, weighed about 200 pounds, but the remains, it is estimated by A. G., weighed about 400. As far as we know, there is no thoroughly authenticated case of human remains undergoing petrifaction, although such a thing might be possible in certain soils. Some of the very old fossil remains of large animals have been found to be petrified, i.e., their substance being filled or replaced by mineral matter which permeated the mass without disturbing the internal structures.

T. R., Tarrytown, N. Y. The parable of the Sower, if we may judge from your letter, received a most inadequate presentation in the sermon you mention. It has been the theme of discourses in thousands of pulpits, and we cannot recall any notable instance in which it has been so thoroughly misinterpreted. The explanation given in verses 10 to 20 of the same chapter make it so clear that he who runs may read. The seed is the Word; the Sower is the Son of Man, and as his representatives, the sowing is done by his preachers and teachers and faithful workers throughout the world. The seed in all cases is the same, but there is a difference in the soil, which represents the different states of the human heart. The seed that fell on stony ground or by the wayside—as seed will frequently do when it is blown by the wind on leaving the hands of the husbandman—typifies the Word when it is addressed to thoughtless, shallow natures where it makes only a superficial impression and is finally choked or smothered by the cares of the world. Only the seed that falls on good ground takes root and thrives and yields harvest. We should imagine that the presentation of the parable in any other sense than the obvious one in which it has been always regarded arose from spiritual ignorance or indifference.

Anxious Soul, Bridgeport, Conn. We can set no limits to God's mercy, for we are distinctly told that he saves "to the uttermost." Moreover, the very fact that a backslider is sick of sin and repentant, and yearning for forgiveness, is evidence that the Holy Spirit is at work drawing him back to God. The passage in Heb. 6: 6, which has been much discussed, is the statement of an experience rather than a doctrine. It is the hardest kind of a task, ordinarily speaking, to reclaim a backslider; but that such can be reclaimed is beyond question. Remember how grievously Peter backslid; yet he was restored. Read the offer of pardon and rehabilitation to repentant backsliders in the second, third and fourth chapters of Jeremiah, and many other passages. The trouble is with the sinner, not with God. The backslider, once confirmed in his apostasy, ceases to have the desire to return. It is the difficulty in dealing with such cases that makes it almost impossible to spiritually renew them and bring them back to their first love; indeed, even though they be renewed and freely pardoned, the bitterness of their offense tinges all their after life. Yet herein is one of the miracles of divine grace, that even one who has crucified Christ afresh may be reclaimed through God's abundant mercy.

T. A., Live Oak, Fla. The "juniper tree" is not used in a symbolical sense. It is a shrub which in desert places affords the only shelter and is therefore naturally the tree under which a traveler would rest from the oppressive heat.

Mrs. M. A. T., Zachary, La. 1. See answer to C. B. B., Waynesboro, Miss. 2. The Christian Herald is interdenominational.

G. W. W., Weaver's Ford, N. C. 1. The phrase "other gods," in the broad interpretation of the language of the Decalogue, not only includes idols and all kinds of imaginary heathen deities, but the love of wealth, power, pleasure, and anything to which we become so devoted that it stands between us and God, who is over all and who should be supreme in our affections, our loyalty, our thoughts and actions. The motto of the truly Christian life is "God first." 2. The prohibition in the Mosaic code against graven images was a very necessary one. The Israelites were surrounded by heathen races, who worshiped a great variety of idols. The idols of Egypt and of the tribes in the peninsula through which the Israelites passed represented many supposed characteristics of their imaginary deities, graven in precious metals or carved from wood or stone. The inevitable tendency on the part of the Israelites would have been to follow the method of their neighbors, by setting up images to the true God, which would have resulted in ultimately drifting into absolute idolatry. The human mind, in its vague reaching out after God, has represented him in many forms, largely human. The Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians and other nations fell into this sin, which is called anthropomorphism, and which attributes to deity not only the figure but the speech, thoughts, actions, passions and affections of man, whereas the majesty of the divine nature is altogether beyond human comprehension. Consequently, the Israelites were forbidden to make any image or the likeness of any animated being or creature whatsoever, in order that they might be wholly free to worship God as a Spirit.

The Clever Chickens

By

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THESE little chickens have made a nest
Deep in my old straw hat.
It's rather clever of them to see
How nice a nest it will really be.
If I were a chicken, oh deary me,
I wouldn't have thought of that.

These little chickens have made a nest
And snuggled down close together.
It's warm, I know, for it once was mine;
As a hat it was always—rather fine—
But who would ever have thought to line
A hat with these balls of feather?

These little chickens have made a nest;
They fit in it pretty tight—
They have black little snapping beady eyes,
That look at me with a vague surprise;
Their feet are tiny—not any size—
And their backs are a yellow white.

These little chickens have made a nest
Deep in my old straw hat;
And I know as I look at them sleeping there
All soft and downy as baby's hair—
If I were a chicken anywhere,
I wouldn't have thought of that!

The Fight for a Trade Route

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

THE fall of Kut-el-Amara is an event of world-wide significance. For the first time in more than a century, a considerable body of British troops has hauled down its flag. The thi red line of England, which has so often fought aga st fearful odds and too often been sent into action wit reckless disregard for proper measures of safety, has urrendered to an Oriental force. For the second tim in a year the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon wa or has been disputed by the troops of "the Sic Man of Europe," in wh sickness England oft proffered aid to ma ain a decadent dy sty on a tottering thr e. Since the with-dra l from Gallipoli, the ill of English arms and brains has been crit zed not only by Mo ems from Cape Ver to Calcutta but by the tire world.

T e indecision of Englan in toying with a diff lt situation at Salon , Gallipoli and Kut-el-A ara may change the tcome of the war. Onl those who know the Ea can comprehend wh this capture of a sca nine thousand tro s, only one-third of om were Englishme means in the psycho gy of a world war in ich, for the first tim Occidental and Ori tal are fighting side by le, using the same wea ons. W y was England fighting in the lower reaches of the igris Valley, while her strongest foe was hurling hu n hordes at the western front and dropping dea -dealing bombs in the streets of London itself? Wh did Germany, hemmed in by overwhelming nu ers of European foes, stretch forth her battle lin ntil it hurled a challenge at the very gates of Ind?

T reason is simple. The world war is not being fou t for small sections of tiny Western Europe, but or ccess to and communication with great undevel ed areas of the world mass. The war is being ou t, not for a European capital, but for a world hig ay.

T e Monroe Doctrine has, temporarily at least, rem ved the Western Hemisphere from the calculatio of European empire. In e remaining three contin ts, the Mesopotamian bat field is the bridgeland of pire and the key to co erce.

direct line from London to istant Auckland and Bri ane passes along the ent length of Mesopotam , and throughout the gre r part of its distance is and route. Aleppo and Mo l, Bagdad and Basra, Ga oli and Kut-el-Amara lie rectly on the shortest lin between the manufac ring centers of England, Be um and the Rhine Valley nd the agricultural and po ation centers of the cro led East. So the Me potamian campaign is not minor warfare carried on the fringes of conflict. It the deciding factor of a wo war.

V dun may go to one side or e other. Poland may fall under the sovereignty of Teuton or Slav. Belgium may be restored to independence or be annexed by some other race. But the real issue of the war is whether the Central Powers can force a break in the long line of Ally colonies which extend for one-third of the world's circumference, from the westernmost point of partitioned Africa to the high mountains and flooded paddy fields of French Indo-China.

For nearly twoscore years German diplomacy has been seeking for a route to the East, which would not be under the surveillance of the powerful British fleet, the gun galleries of Gibraltar, or the canal dues of Suez. The fall of Kut-el-Amara may be the turning point in the up-hill fight which she has made to gain a world highway.

In 1878, after the Treaty of Berlin, Bismarck announced that the Balkans were "not worth the bones of a single Pomeranian grenadier." In 1916 they are under Teuton control, after a whirlwind campaign in which Germany extended her battle lines till they crossed the narrow strip of water at the ferry house of three continents and carried the European War into Asia, whence dusky troops had already been drawn to fight the battles of aristocratic Europe, shoulder to shoulder with the flower of French, Belgian and English manhood.

Since the Treaty of Berlin, one-fifth of the land mass of the world has come under European control. Germany's share in this land rush has been but little more than tiny Belgium's. The strongest military power in Europe was unable to gain much in the partition of the undeveloped sections of the world. Germany gained only one-tenth as much land as was seized by those who are now opposing her. Her teeming population and restless industries seek for new worlds in which to develop, but they are taken.

The important fact was not that other European nations took more land than Germany, but that, in doing so, they closed Germany's line of connection with the colonies and markets which she already had.

Since the time that Bismarck spurned what Germany has now won, England has taken Egypt and Cyprus from Turkey and has strengthened her hold on Persia, Baluchistan and Afghanistan. France has taken Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, and Indo-China. Italy has seized Libya, consisting of Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and has deserted the Alliance to join the Allies. The unoccupied gaps in the land mass have been closed by Allied intervention; the Mediterranean has become a British lake; Russia has renewed her aggressiveness as a colonizing power; France and England, distrustful of each other in 1904, have come to realize their community of interests; and the loosely organized Entente has gained unity of desire to crush the aspiring youngster which triumphed in the Franco-Prussian War.

Germany saw world colonies and markets snatched from her eager grasp, and a protected trade route to the East became a necessity and a last resort. One rich field for colonization remained. The Ottoman Empire, ruled by a backward race, whose inability to rule well had been demonstrated by many a ruthless master, but bolstered up by English jealousy of Russia, had persisted in the midst of the modern economic advance. Denied the possibility of ever making a strong nation of itself, Turkey had been maintained as a buffer state.

One part after another of the once powerful Ottoman Empire had been hacked away, but the core was left to guard Constantinople, thus keeping in disorder the greatest trade route and richest river valley of history. Turkey was forced to persist, but hindered from developing. A weak buffer state was needed, and the hands that had strangled Persia were seeking her throat, not to end her existence, but to prevent the aspiring Young Turk from achieving his ideals.

But Germany made friends with the "unspeakable Turk" and began to instil self-confidence and respect in the Young Turk party. She gave them a dream of an enduring state, bound by ties of friendship to herself, but protected and aided in its advance and no longer held in contempt. Germany saw the value of Asia Minor and the Mesopotamian region, and as one part of Turkey after another was seized by Christian nations, Germany imbued the Young Turk, driven from Europe, with the dream of a worthy future in Asia.

A fully equipped Turkish regimental band the skilful aid of W. Morgan Shuster and other American advisers, was divided between the Russian bear, waking from its long hibernation in the cold northland and stretching forth its sharp claws and heavy feet toward the warmth of the southern sun, and the British lion, prowling about the Persian oil fields to guard that store of fuel for the navy which was to maintain Britannia as the ruler of the waves.

After thirteen years of fighting, in which nearly every European nation sought to block her plans. Germany in 1902 finally secured a concession for the Bagdad Railway, extending the Anatolian Railway from Konia in Anatolia to Koweit on the Persian Gulf, a distance of 1,314 miles. England became alarmed at this move on the part of her most progressive rival, for the status quo was too favorable to England to be tampered with.

From Aden British influence has reached out to Oman and Yemen. The power under whose flag the Great Mosque at Delhi and the El Azhar University are guaranteed religious protection, seeks to include Mecca and Medina among its numerous centers of Moslem reverence and homage. To control the Moslem sacred cities is to control the Moslem. With the narrow border lands of the Arabian desert under her control, England could complacently gaze forth on the British-controlled Mediterranean, the fertile Valley of the Nile, Baluchistan, India and Burma, stretching in pleasing perspective from Gibraltar to Mandalay. But a German seaport at Koweit and a land route severing this line of colonies at its center would be a fearsome rift in the English lute. Great Britain served notice on Germany that an attempt to continue the railway south of Bagdad would be regarded as a cause for war. Germany abandoned this part of her plan for the time being. Then the war came, and Kut-el-Amara became one of the decisive steps in the campaign.

A citadel or castle of tribesmen on the plains outside Kut-el-Amara

In the minds of the Turk, Gallipoli and Kut-el-Amara are not minor matters. British prestige has here suffered past all power of recovery. Having started a Persian Gulf campaign, England dare not withdraw. That would either endanger India through outward attack or inward insurrection following such an admission of defeat, or release the Turkish Persian Gulf army for service against the Russian advance in the Armenian theater of war. English soldiers have advanced far up the Tigris and Euphrates valleys, and at whatever cost of life another surrender must not follow.

The value of England to India and Egypt is that of protection. There is no racial or religious bond connecting Indian rajah or Egyptian pasha to imperial Britisher. As long as the invincible squadrons and colonial armies of England can guarantee protection and prosperity, they are loyally supported. But a loss of prestige alters Oriental opinion more than the Western reader can imagine. England is feared and respected as a lion by her Asiatics. She will be devoured if she becomes a lamb.

In spite of her defeats since 1911, Turkey is still looked upon as the spiritual head of Islam. If now the Turk defeats the Britisher, the rallying of race and religion around the green flag may well prove a deciding factor, not only in world war, but in world religion.

We treat the East as though it were dead. It is neither dead nor sleeping. From Morocco to Hokkaido, it is watching which way to jump. The fall of Kut filled pages of our newspapers, but this is no indication of the space it occupies in the minds of Eastern peoples. If the report is true, the biggest feature in today's news is the rumor that the German fifth army is being gathered at Smyrna under Von Sanders. Is Grand Duke Nicholas to be driven back over his route of steady triumph? Is some Allied landing force at Alexandretta to be met in its attempt to sever Turkey? Is an autumn attack on India to be organized within the sound of French dreadnoughts?

This war will probably continue, not until Paris or Berlin falls into the hands of a triumphant but decimated army, but until it is definitely decided whether a German sphere of influence shall be allowed to intrude between the Ally colonies of the Mediterranean region and the English possessions in the Far East. Controlling, as she does, the seas, will England insist on controlling all land routes as well? Will German industry be allowed to ignore the British-controlled Mediterranean and build a land route to the East, or will this ambitious plan of world trade be forever crushed?

Russian forces have not yet entered Constantinople, nor effected a union with the Allies across the Balkans or Turkey. The Allied fleets failed to force the Dardanelles. Bagdad is still under the Star and Crescent. England dare not withdraw her troops from Egypt or India, Basra or Salonica.

YET the plan of Germany is dangerous. From Bremen to Bagdad is a long line, vulnerable in several points. Foes threaten her at Salonica, Erzingan, Alexandretta, and Khanikin. Even on the lower Tigris, the river over which British vessels carried $20,000,000 worth of trade with Bagdad in 1912, is open to British landing forces, and the outlet of the ancient rivers is still in British hands.

The ancient granary of the world

Now is the time for England and Russia t act. With Turkey severed between Alexandrett and Bitlis, the fall of the Turkish Mesopotamian rmy would be assured, and Germany's daring adv ture would be at an end. Russia will then have her p t on the Mediterranean and her window on Europe. ith the supreme desire of Germany for a trade oute and a rich colony definitely defeated, a speedy eace is possible.

IT is vain to prophesy the outc e of battles and wars. But two ings are inevitable. Mesopotamia wi once more blossom as it did in the d s of Nineveh and Babylon. It is c able of supporting great populatio an exporting vast quantities of food uff. It has valuable mineral resourc the demand for which, as in the c e of copper, is increasing with ver advance of modern industry. The other certainty is that a railwa wil traverse the ancient trade rout by the bridge land of three conti nts joining the countless millions c consumers and agricultural store uses of the East with the teeming f tory towns of Manchester or Düss lorf, Sheffield, Brussels or St. Etienn

A Bagdad Railway, ultimatel continued to India and possibly to rma and China itself, is as inevita e as was the Suez Canal, the Si plon Tunnel or the Culebra Cut. hree population centers, in the wer the Yangtse, the Ganges, and arou the North Sea, are reaching out fo ach other with all the insistence of t leaf seeking light or the root s king moisture. The Suez route is to ong, too subject to the dominatio f a single masterful navy, too sl for modern civilization. The quest n is, who will control this land ro for world trade?

Will German artillery rend the ght-thousand-mile strip of Allied c nies of Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, T poli, Egypt, India and French Indo- hina and smash a path to the East w the power of land guns? Will Ge any divide honors with England, or t nely submit to the domination of Gibr ar's guns and English control of E ypt? Can a land army win its share the world's markets? Kut-el-Amar is a possible clue to the answer.

The Mesopotamian outlet off the only solution to the problem an industrial Germany with a ker fleet than that of England. Germany entered t and grab too late to become a colonial nation. Her ture lies in her trade. Her trade with the many- ired East depends upon the control of the Bagdad ute. Her food supply depends upon the control of a tile colony such as Mesopotamia will become.

Two direct lines lead from Bremen to Aus lia. One leads through Vienna, Constantinople, B lad, Bombay, Madras and Singapore. For one-h the distance that route could be controlled by a land my. The other line passes through the Panama Can and is subject to the demands of the British navy th ghout its entire length. Each route half circles the be. England's navy will control the latter. Will Ge any succeed in controlling the rthwest end of the former? T war must decide that.

One other possibility r ins. South America is a rich fi for colonization. To secure pea and unity along the entire mas rom Morocco to South China, E and might allow Germany a fre and in the Latin American cou ries, where Germany has already tablished important trade rel ons. This would subject Germa hipping to English dreadnough but not to Gibraltar and Su It Germany is banished from esopotamia, South America the only remaining outlet for pr ucts "made in Germany."

Vacations That Count

It is a vexing question, this question of what to do with your vacation. The dates are set. There are certain weeks in which you are automatically detached from the orderly processes of business. You are shunted out into the world at large with the expectation that you will enjoy these weeks in such fashion as to bring you back to your work with a renewed grip on yourself and on your every endeavor. You have had vacations before. Some of them have used up your money and sent you back to your work more tired than when you left. Recuperating from such a vacation is often made the subject of a joke, but not by the recuperator. After such vacation you have often wished that you might never have another. You have told yourself that it would be better to work right along rather than to inject such strenuous weeks into the course of a year. But there have been other vacations which have been remembered with increasing joy as intervening days have pushed them farther into the past.

Now the question is, where will you go this year in order that your vacation may send you back to your work with new visions and with new power? There are lakes and mountain resorts and sea trips and railway trips and quiet farmhouses, and the homes of relatives. From all these you might choose just the place. But there is one kind of place which you can choose in full confidence that the choice will be no mistake. Such a place is any one of the summer conferences of religious workers which are held in various accessible places throughout the country.

THE summer conference is always placed where nature has done her best to make a vacation ground. Every facility has been provided for comfort without inconvenience; and the cost has been kept within the means of any one who can afford to go anywhere. The conferences continue through June, July and August, with a series of programs any one of which will give you a new hold upon your own life and on that faith in Christ which must be the foundation of every worth-while life. The conferences are not all serious business by any means. The hour of rising coincides with the first flush of day, and the first exercise is a sunrise prayer meeting under the trees on some grassy hillside, or within the sound of murmuring waves, or in sight of snow-capped peaks—a prayer meeting in which the soul is born anew as it draws near to God under the inspiration of nature, God's greatest masterpiece. And there is the camp breakfast, a wholesome meal with wholesome people, where the conversation is wholesome but free and sparkling with ready wit, for the folks who go to these conferences are not addicted to any kind of religious cant or hypocritical pose. They are just plain folks who have seen the vision of the Christ and seek to know more of him, but whose feet are on the ground, and who have not forgotten how to be human while they seek the divine. Then there are study classes and addresses by men of note. Classes and addresses that will lead you to see new meanings in life, that will make real some things that you have never understood, and that will show you that your life work is to do the will of God in that particular field in which he has placed you or to which he is leading you. But in between, there is a swim in the lake or the sea, or a mountain climb above the clouds, or a fishing trip, or just a lazy half-hour in the hammock. You can find solitude, or you can enjoy yourself among good company. After dinner there is perhaps another address; then there are games in which age renews its youth and youth is at its best, and in which each develops, through hearty exercise, a hearty appetite. Then after supper, while the sun hangs low in the western sky and the sunset approaches, there is a vesper service, where souls awakened tell the riches of God's grace, and the Scriptures are explained by those who have studied the heart of God as well as his Word. Then an inspirational address by some leader of men or of movements ends in time for bed at nine o'clock, and the day is over, and you sleep hard, to awaken refreshed and ready for another day.

When this vacation is over, you will return with every nerve tuned for a hard year's work, and with a new grip on yourself and a new grip on God and a new interest in everything worth while. The garments of the past will have fallen away. The world to which you come back will be a new world because you will see it with new eyes, and work will be a pleasure because you will have learned how to do it in his name; for after all it is not only the ministers and the deaconesses and the missionaries whose daily work is done for him, but every day's work that is done by a Christian is done under his eyes and should be done for him.

THE best-known conferences are those held at Northfield, Mass., under the auspices of the Moody Bible School; the summer classes at Chautauqua Lake, N. Y., and the conferences held at Silver Bay, N. Y., Blue Ridge, N. C., Lake Geneva, Wis., and Estes Park, Colo., in which the Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, Student Volunteer Movement, Missionary Education Movement and Young People's Societies provide for a continuous program throughout the summer. In addition to these better-known camps there are others under the same auspices at Ocean Park, Me., and Asilomar, Calif., and a very new one at Seabeck, Wash., a beautiful four-hour sail down Puget Sound from Seattle. Then there is the interdenominational campmeeting at Old Orchard, Me., and the well-known assembly at Winona Lake, Ind., under the direction of the Presbyterian Church, and a similar all-summer assembly at Ocean Grove, N. J., under the Methodist Church. The Presbyterian Church also has conferences at Pocono Pines, Pa.; Storm Lake, Iowa; Ovoca (Tullahoma), Tenn.; San Marcos, Texas; Hollister, Mo., and Hastings, Neb. The Congregational Church has a conference ground at Frankfort, Mich., and another at Isle of Shoals, Me.; the Baptists have an assembly at Hightstown, N. J., and they have a number of local assemblies both in the North and in the South. The Episcopalians have summer conferences at Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., and at Cambridge, Mass. The Reformed Church in the United States has a series of conferences also, and the Christian Endeavor, B. Y. P. U. and Epworth League all conduct small local conferences in addition to the ones in which they join with the Missionary Education Movement.

The exact dates and programs for these and other conferences can be obtained by writing to any of the organizations mentioned above or to the Home Missionary Office of your own church. There are too many programs and too many dates for the Christian Herald to attempt to give them all, but the Christian Herald will be glad to give such detailed information as it can to any subscriber or reader who will write for it.

Each year a larger number of people are planning to take their vacation at one of these conferences, and each year churches are being blessed by the return of these vacationists with their new vision and new impetus and a new enthusiasm for the work of the Kingdom. Many people would not think of spending their vacation in any other way, for the conference is not a thing for one summer; it is ever new.

Methodist Congress at Work. The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church opened at Saratoga, N. Y., May 1. The presence of delegates speaking twenty-three languages and dialects, gathered from every part of the globe except countries barred out by the war, the fraternal greetings of these and of delegates from other English-speaking Methodist bodies, threw into clear relief the proposition for organic union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and the Methodist Protestant Church, this proposition being among the first subjects considered by the conference. The conference enthusiastically approved the plan of union already approved by the church South, and appointed a committee to carry on further negotiations, with the expectation that the union of the three denominations, and possibly some others, would become effective by 1920. The question of the future relationship to united Methodism of the Negro Methodists, now under the jurisdiction of the Northern church, is one which this committee will have to work out. The Southern church favors the setting of all the negro organizations apart as a separate church.

An attempt to revise the ritual in the conference proved that the task was too great for the time that could be given to it, and the whole matter was referred to the Board of Bishops, with power to act. The conservative element that fought any modernization of ancient forms proved in a minority. A report of the Committee on the State of the Church, recommending that in the Methodist Episcopal publishing houses the preference should be given to union labor, was not adopted by the conference, on the ground that it was class legislation. The policy of the shops is now friendly toward organized labor. The conference voted its disapproval of all the bills now pending in Congress giving the Postmaster General authority to deny the use of the mails to publications tending to "expose any creed, race or religion either to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy." A proposal to raise $5,000,000 by a world-wide campaign for foreign missions was adopted. The committee on Episcopacy recommended the election of seven new bishops to fill five vacancies and the creation of new episcopal residences at Detroit and Pittsburg. The first ballot on May 16 resulted in no election. On the eighth, ninth and tenth ballots Rev. Herbert Welch, Rev. Thomas Nicholson and Rev. Adna W. Leonard were elected bishops. The congress closes May 31.

Wages Advanced Without Strike. On May 11 the 18,000 employees of the Willys-Overland Company received an advance of 20 per cent. in their wages. The advance means an increase in the weekly pay roll of about $25,000.

From Ocean to Ocean in Seven Days. At 2:43 o'clock on the afternoon of May 15, E. G. Baker stopped his automobile at the Times Building, New York City, after making a run of 3,471 miles from Los Angeles in seven days, eleven hours and fifty-two minutes, lowering his previous record made in a Stutz car last year by three days, nineteen hours and twenty-three minutes. The car used this year was a standard 8-cylinder Cadillac. The best day's run was 567 miles, the slowest 300 miles, Kansas City to St. Louis, in 18 hours.

Why Wooden Cars? The Knickerbocker Press of Albany, N. Y., in seeking the answer to this question, found that to replace with steel cars the wooden passenger coaches now operating on American railroads would require an expenditure of $528,787,100. On December 31, 1915, of 61,728 cars in service 41,382 were wooden cars, 14,286 all steel, 6,060 had steel underframes. In three years 6,744 wooden cars have been retired, 2,130 of them last year. But at this rate, which is, however, an accelerating rate, it would take twenty years to displace all the wooden cars. Last year 1,250 all-steel cars were purchased by American railroads an only 96 wooden ones. Of ,094 cars under constructio January 1, only three w e of wood.

Munitions Fatal . ain. On May 15 an explo n of trinitrotoluol at the p t of the Du Pont Powder ompany near Gibbstown, . J., which manufactures m erial for filling shells, des yed property valued at $2 ,000 and cost the lives of fo teen men. The whole pla was put out of action.

In answer to the protest of the Chinese minister, the Japanese foreign office replied that it could not prevent rowdy Japanese from assisting the Chinese revolutionists. The southern rebels have proclaimed Lee Yuan Hung president of their provisional government, and have formed a war cabinet with Tang Chi Yao as chairman.

The Mexican Situation. General Pershing's troops are still concentrated at Colonia Dublan and Namiquipa. General Funston has organized 50,000 regulars and militia into three brigades for the thorough protection of the border. Villa has been reported in the state of Durango, where he is said to have accumulated a force variously reported at from 2,500 to 5,000 men. Major George T. Langhorne and his flying squadron of the Eighth United States Cavalry, operating south of Marathon, Texas, with no line of communications established, and with the nearest American force under Colonel Sibley a day's march in their rear, overtook, on May 12, the leaders of the band of outlaws who raided Glenn Springs and Boquillas on May 5, rescued the two Americans who were carried away by the Mexicans, captured two bandits and killed five. The American soldiers suffered no casualties; but in order to make this stroke they were constantly in the saddle for two days and a half and penetrated 100 miles into Mexico.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

IRISH affairs became much quieter during the week, though there were several more military executions of prominent leaders in the late rebellion, among whom was James Connolly, the man who was styled by his associates commandant general of the Irish republican army. Connolly, who had had his thigh broken by a bullet during the fighting, was unable to stand, and, it is reported, had to be propped up by supports at the time of his execution.

Mr. Asquith went to Ireland early in the week, and his arrival was followed by a relaxation of the rigors of martial law. He visited not only Dublin but Belfast, and endeavored everywhere to tranquillize the people. It is reported that the premier has arrived at the conclusion that the old form of government in Ireland has had its day, and that some new form must be devised to satisfy the needs of the country.

The refusal of Ulster (which is to some degree understandable) to accept any proposal which implies the application of the Home Rule Bill, or the principles of that bill, to Ulster, somewhat increases the difficulty of arriving at a solution of the problem applicable to the whole of Ireland, but there appear to be hopes that this obstacle will be overcome.

Premier Asquith was sworn in as a member of the Irish Privy Council in the middle of the week, which is noteworthy in that it is the first time that an English prime minister has taken a seat in that body.

Sir Roger Casement underwent a preliminary examination in Bow Street Police Court to determine whether or not he should be placed on trial for high treason, and with him was also examined Daniel J. Bailey, or Beverly, a man who had been in the British army in the early part of the war, but had been captured and put in a German prison camp, from which he was subsequently released to aid Sir Roger in his expedition to Ireland.

On this preliminary examination the Crown offered sufficient evidence to prove a prima facie case, and the prisoners, reserving their defense at the conclusion of the examination, were formally committed for trial on a charge of high treason. The last case of high treason tried in England was that of the King vs. Lynch in 1903, which grew out of the war of the Transvaal. Previously there had been none for sixty-two years.

THERE has been much talk of peace in the last ten days. On Saturday, May 13, Lord Cecil said regarding the rumors of peace negotiations in an interview with a representative of the Associated Press that Great Britain has never been approached by Germany with any peace suggestions, and that no formal conference between Great Britain and her allies has ever taken place to consider any suggestions of peace coming from Germany.

The possible events of the next few weeks make it worth while to remember this statement, and also to remember that Mr. Asquith a few weeks ago paid a visit to the Pope at Rome, and had an interview of considerable length. Lord Cecil, in what he says, has undoubtedly told the strict truth, but whether he has told all he knows about conferences on peace between the Allies, and peace negotiations, is another and a very different matter. Sir Edward Grey, early in the past week, also had something to say on this subject, and in his remarks the accustomed formula of "Germany must be crushed" was for the first time omitted.

President Poincaré, in a speech on May 14, defined the conditions on which France will accept peace, but it is well to remember that the President of France is, by the French constitution, merely a political figurehead, the center of the circle of the government, and that, as a rule, heretofore all statements of governmental policy which are to be regarded as authoritative have emanated from the president of the council, who is, under the French scheme of government, the man in authority.

Hence, until Briand speaks, nothing definitely authoritative will have been said, and it is to be noticed that Briand is at the moment silent. Peace is in the air, and the very fact that the subject is occupying the attention of the governments of the important belligerents in the conflict gives body to the hope that peace may come in a reasonable time.

THE Austro-Italian front toward the middle of the week became suddenly active, the Austrians taking the offensive unexpectedly. Just prior to the beginning of this offensive the situation on this front was that in the year of war between these two countries the Italians had made themselves masters of 780 square miles of Austrian territory; while on the other hand the Austrians held about 125 square miles of Italy's area. The net Italian gain was therefore just about twice the area within the corporation limits of the city of Greater New York.

This offensive began on Tuesday, May 16, on the south Tyrol front, where the Austrians, after a rather extensive artillery preparation, launched an assault on and captured positions which it had cost the Italians weeks of effort to establish themselves in. In addition to heavy losses inflicted on the enemy, the Austrians captured sixty-five officers, nearly 3,000 men, and eighteen pieces of artillery.

On Wednesday the Austrian offensive continued, and with success. On these several advances more than 6,000 prisoners were captured and considerable artillery taken.

The French commentators on the war seem to think that the object of this Austrian offensive is to break through to the plain of Vicenza, which may be true, though it seems equally probable that, in view of the possibility of an early general armistice, the movement is made with a view of clearing as much Austrian territory of the Italian forces as possible before such armistice comes.

There is no news which is reliable from the northern border of Greece, though there is a report that the Bulgarians are moving troops southward from the Rumanian border. If this is confirmed it will be of considerable importance, as it will be a rather good proof that Bulgaria and Rumania have an understanding, since if Bulgaria had any doubt of Rumania's future course she would hardly withdraw her troops from that frontier. Great Britain announced officially that the outstanding differences between Greece and the Entente powers have been settled amicably, with the result that there will be no violation of Greek neutrality.

On the Mesopotamian front there is nothing new concerning the British forces to the east of Kut-el-Amara, on the Tigris. The Russian campaign in Asia Minor seems now divided into five movements: the first moving in a general southerly direction from Trebizond along or near the coast of the Black Sea; the second moving from Erzerum westerly, apparently striving to join the first. Neither of these have made much if any progress this week. The third is moving southerly from Erzerum toward Erzingan. This had rather a hard time this week and has been thrown back, if anything. The fourth is advancing through Kurdistan towards Mosul, the site of Nineveh, a town which would be on the Bagdad railroad had the middle stretch of this railroad been

*A SERMON BY REV. JOSEPH W. KEMP

TEXT—Ps. 37:23. "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord."

IT would appear, from a reading of verse 25, that this psalm was written in David's old age, and therefore what he says stands supported by his experience and his honor. His declarations are upheld and pledged by all the strength and veracity of "the man after God's own heart."

The subject of the psalm is that ever-present and perplexing theme of the prosperity of the wicked and the affliction of the righteous. It is a strange problem, and one very perplexing to faith. We must not on that account yield to repining and fretting, which are most impressively forbidden in the psalm, while a cheerful trust in the Lord is urged upon us. There are worse things than being poor, and there are better things than being rich. The days of the wicked are numbered, and if his fields are greener than those of the righteous, they are the readier for the scythe. His branches may be like those of the green bay tree, reaching high and spreading wide; but very soon tree and man will both be gone. The great man and his estates will have disappeared, his name will be forgotten and his possessions alienated—not a trace of him left. If the bad man flourishes he shall be blasted in his leafy verdure. Virtue alone is immortal. The righteous shall hold on his way. "I have marked the perfect man, I have beheld the upright, and the end of that man is peace."

WE shall first describe the man. He is spoken of as a good man. That is a plain, matter-of-fact way of stating a great truth regarding the man. This text does not apply to every man, for all men do not bear the title "good." According to the standards of men, the human race is divided and subdivided into almost endless divisions; but according to the divine classification, there are but two great classes on this earth, the bad and the good. The Bible recognizes no other. The line of demarcation is clearly and sharply drawn in Holy Writ. Men are either saved or unsaved. We are hearing a lot of talk today about neutrality, but here is a sphere where neutrality does not obtain. Spiritually and morally, we are either black or white; there is no neutral grey.

What does it mean to be a "good man"? In the text before us, the word good is in italics, which means that the translators put the word there to supply what they thought to be lacking in the original. Probably it was the best word that could be found to express the sense; but we shall miss much of its meaning if we confine ourselves to that aspect of it presented to us by modern usage of the term. A "good" man is God's man, and by that is meant that the man belongs to God, and that the entire realm of his manhood is at the disposal of God. Such a view of our relationship lends dignity and nobility to life.

WE may gather from the body of the psalm what kind of a man this good man is. He is said to be a righteous man (verse 16). He is therefore one who does rightly. He lives righteously and loves righteousness. Not that he of himself is righteous, but he is such by his having been brought into contact with God. That righteousness is the only kind the Lord recognizes. Righteousness is a word that has come to be a theological term, which people use without attaching any very distinct meaning to it. It is a well-worn and threadbare word, not having very much reference to our daily lives, so some think; but should not the production of such a character be the highest aim a man sets before himself? Righteousness is neither more nor less than the submission of the self to God, and the practicing in life and conduct of the things that be of him.

Furthermore, the psalm states that the good man is an upright man. Verse 18: "The Lord knoweth the days of the upright: and their inheritance shall be forever." What is uprightness? Shall we invert the word, although it may sound odd, and call it "rightupness"? He is erect; straight in his character and conduct. There is nothing shady or mean about him. He goes straight on, walking circumspectly. He is sincere and clear, without duplicity or debasement, and is himself free from black shame and crimson guilt.

Here is the type of man the world is waiting for. Alas! Alas! profession is common enough, plentiful as the leaves in the autumn; but profession is not enough. There must be no disparity between what the man professes to be and what he is. Many a man has a good creed which he denies by his bad conduct. Such a man had better abandon his creed, or change his conduct, or bring his conduct to tally with his creed. "I question," said Spurgeon, "whether, as a channel for damnation, Satan has upon earth more apt instruments for breeding infidelity and for causing men to regard the Gospel with contempt, than those who profess to believe it and then act as though the belief were a matter of no consequence whatsoever." The words are strong, but they are no stronger than they are true. It is heartbreaking, the havoc that is being wrought in the church and out of it by the inconsistent lives of the professors of Christ's Christianity. The "good" man is an upright man. Am I good in that sense? If not, I am bad.

AGAIN, the good man is merciful. Thus we read in verse 21: "The righteous showeth mercy." Mercy is a quality existing in the heart of the righteous, and will often express itself in merciful actions. The Biblical definition of mercy is not that which confines it to definite acts of mercy, but has reference to the inner nature and disposition. He will be merciful in his opinions, his feelings, his judgment, in his criticism of others. We have only to reflect on this attitude of heart to see how it would sweeten the whole of life and make all our intercourse to be of the pleasantest kind. If any man has received mercy at the hand of Christ he will keep that fact vividly before his consciousness and he will be the last man to fly at his brother's throat, saying, "Pay me that thou owest." The acceptance of Christ as a free gift binds us to manifest the spirit of that gift in feeling and in conduct. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

A further characteristic of the good man is that he is frail. "Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down." Fall he may, but he will never fall away. He may, like Joseph, fall into misfortune. Many a good man has had his good name dragged through mire and dirt through no fault of his own. Walk as carefully as we may in a world such as this, we shall nevertheless find ourselves open to the malice of the evil-disposed. Or, like Job, the good man may fall into despondency. He may for the time being lose his joy, but that is not to suppose that he has lost his salvation. Yes, the soldier may fall in the battle, but he does not on that account cease being a soldier. A thousand things combine to bring the man of God down and cause him to fall; but he shall not be utterly cast down, for the Lord upholdeth him. What comfort this gives to the one who knows something of the weakness of his own heart! The assurance of promised help will not make the child of God careless of his conduct and walk, but it will strengthen him in the hour of testing. The Lord upholdeth him. He does not leave the keeping to a delegated agency. He affords personal assistance.

Such is the man of whom the psalmist is sp ing. He is righteous, upright, merciful and frail. D see myself in the picture drawn by this master han

WHAT is said about the good man? It said that his "steps are ordered." What ca that mean but that all the life, with its activities, it icissitudes, its comings and its goings, all of its ried experiences, are controlled by the Lord? Wha ould be more restful to the soul than to know that is in the keeping of the Lord, and not subject to th haphazard happenings of superstition and fate? here are to be found, even in this Christian country hose who are so bound by superstition as to make fe a positive burden. They will not embark on tain business enterprises on a given day in the wee nor will they be one of thirteen to sit at the meal ble. Even the average share of common sense ough be enough to dissipate such nonsense; at any e, it should not be heard of where there is a profes n of God in the life. Some people are always ring noises, seeing shapes, and allowing themselves be moved by what they call intuition. Some steal t at eventide that they may forecast the future the manner of the stars. It is all so utterly unwo y of an enlightened Christian that we are led to q tion the reality of the faith of any so acting. H who "endures as seeing Him who is invisible" can tru say,

"My times are in thy hand—
My God, I wish them there.
My life, my friends, my soul I leave
Entirely to thy care."

A clear conviction that all our steps are ord d of the Lord will create within us a keen sense the nearness of the presence of God that will put end to the grim idea of an iron fate compelling all ngs. With a living, loving God superintending all ngs, we are at peace.

NOTICE how minute the divine ordering is. The "steps" are watched. Not the leaps a the bounds, the runnings and the rushings, but the eps. This is one of the most comforting as well as one the most wonderful truths of the Bible: that God ould have regard to the detail of a human life. Has not said, "The very hairs of your head are all numb d"? He knoweth the way that I take. Our goings e at his pleasure, and our very steps are the sub t of divine decree. Aye, and may we not add that the steps only, but also the "stops" are ordered o im? "Thank you for that word 'stops,'" said a per xed friend to a preacher at the close of a service ttle while ago. "Now I know why my progres was arrested." It is not always easy to reconcile " ye into all the world" with "Go into the wildern and there I will talk with thee." A sick-bed may as much a part of the divine plan of our life as a m ionary tour.

The steps are ordered. The Lord conducts, ides and directs. I do not see how we can otherwise on-cile ourselves to the various and oftentimes conf ting circumstances of life. The life of many a ma is a trying one indeed, and there are many difficultie be met and overcome. The road we are trave is studded with many a sharp point, and of oursel we can hardly pick our way. "Man's goings are the Lord; how can a man then understand his own y?"

Our duties, too, are appointed of the Lord. t is only when we bring that thought to bear up the smallest acts and occupations which constitute ies, that life takes on the "golden hue"; otherwi life is a dreary treadmill, and, like indolent wo men wearying for the end of the day, we long for its ose. To say "this and that is divinely ordered" an hat "the Lord has prepared this and that for me" s to elevate, sweeten and calm the soul. Let us bri our duties into connection with his appointment and they will all be easy.

THERE is one other word to add, and it is this Our happiness and security, and it may be adde our usefulness, are bound up in our absolute surren r to the divine will, and it is only when we "in all ou ays acknowledge Him" that we may claim "he will ect our paths." We have too often tried to manage o wn affairs and have just as often failed to do so wis .

There is a good deal of sanctified wisdom i hat saying of Thomas Watson, that prince of P tan divines: "Never did saints carve for themselv but they cut their own fingers." Trust yourself the unerring wisdom of the Lord, and "when thou est, thy steps shall not be straightened; and when hou runnest thou shalt not stumble."

WITHOUT MOTHER

By Marie Galbraith

IT'S awful lonesome at our house
'Thout Mother;
It's just as quiet as a mouse
'Thout Mother.
An' Father looks so lonely there
Of evenin's, sittin' in his chair;
It just ain't cheerful anywhere
'Thout Mother!

It's awful hard to get along
'Thout Mother;
It seems like everything goes wrong
'Thout Mother.
'Course, Father does the best he can;
But then, you know, he's just a man,
An' don't know how to fix an' plan
Like Mother.

Seems like I don't enjoy my play
'Thout Mother;
Things just get worser every day
'Thout Mother!
There's no one now to mend my doll,
Nobody's sorry when I fall,—
Oh, home just ain't no place at all
'Thout Mother!

But Father says we must be brave
'Thout Mother,
'Cause him an' me, we only have
One 'nother.
An' if we're brave, an' strong, an' true,
An' good, just like she told us to,
We'll go up Home, when life is through,
To Mother.

The Ministry of Infusion

SUNDAY, June 4. John, 7:38. "He that believeth on me . . . out of him shall flow rivers of living water." Such is the inevitable influence of a life of faith. Where there is the vital belief there is bound to be the flowing river. The living issue is not an act of will, but the outcome of a relation. Our finest ministry is not so much a conscious as an unconscious influence. Our faith brings us into communion with the Fountain of life, and then every highway in our being becomes the channel of his holy grace. Everything becomes influential, our rest as well as our labor, our restraints as well as our freedom, our waiting as well as our acting, our silences as well as our speech. The power of our being is washing against other beings, irrigating, and fertilizing, and refreshing the ground of the common life. "Everything shall live whither the river cometh!"

There is a very suggestive sentence in one of Goldwin Smith's letters: "Gladstone, though little open to argument, was very open to infusion: and I have always believed that Morley had a great hand in infusing into him Home Rule." That is the expression of a very commanding principle, and I think we find it in our Lord's teaching about the invisible river in the believer's life. Every life is far more influential in its infusions than in its ordered marches, but this is preeminently true of the life that is hidden with Christ in God. Men may be hostile to our logic who are yet hospitable to our spirit. We can reach them with an inspiration when our arguments fail. Our river triumphs when our formal approaches are rejected. We can infuse when we cannot convince.

And all this opens out wonderful channels of ministry. We can infuse one another with courage even when we utter no heroic words. Our own brave spirit is in circulation, and its strong, steady current is flowing into the common life. And we can infuse one another with quietness. Who has not experienced the quieting influence of a quiet presence? Who has not felt the pressure as of a strong steady hand, when some quiet woman has been about in the hour of sorrow or death? Yes, our own quietness can be transmitted by this ministry of infusion. "Then had thy peace been like a river!"

Our rivers will be all right if we are right at the springs. If the Lord is our Shepherd, our cup will run over. And therefore it is our highest wisdom to cherish our highest relation and to put our trust in the Lord. "All our springs are in thee"; and if we abide in the Lord our rivers will always be flowing. Yea, even in time of trouble, when the mountains are being shaken in the heart of the sea, there shall be "a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God."

Jesus, Companion, Defender and Preserver

MONDAY, June 5. 1 Sam. 17:32-40. "Thy servant kept his father's sheep." The moorlands around Bethlehem do not present features of soft beauty, but are wild, gaunt, strong, character-breeding. In early days there were lions and bears, and the wild Bedouin, to make a shepherd's life full of anxiety and adventure. Such was the environment of David's youth. But his spirit lay open to the Spirit of God, which brooded over his pure, strong young soul; teaching, quickening, and ennobling him, and unfolding the spiritual counterparts of all the incidents of outward experience. His thoughts at this time are reflected in such Psalms as 8, 19, 23, and 29—so full was he of wonder that Jehovah should care for him, and so sure that he was his shepherd; so chivalrous to defend one lamb from the beast of prey; so aware of the presence and power of the living God. Happy the flock that lay under his care! No hireling he, who, when the wolf should come, would flee because the sheep were not his own and he had no care for them!

Herein we have a faint foreshadowing of a greater than David. Behind the son of Jesse there rises the matchless Son of God, to whom the Father has entrusted the care and tendance we need so sorely. We also are assailed by the lion and bear; we also need to be led to green pastures and waters of rest; we also require protection when we traverse those sunless gorges, where the dark pines shed a somberness on our path and the torrent thunders over its rocky bed far down in the hollow. But Jesus is with us. We can never perish, neither shall any pluck us out of his hand. He will never leave nor forsake! He carries his rod to ward off our foes, and his crook to extricate us from any jut in which our carelessness may land us.

The Lips Should Speak What the Heart Feels

TUESDAY, June 6. Dent. 32:2. "My speech shall distil as the dew." M. Joubert said of a certain period in which he lived: "Admiration has reappeared, and rejoiced a saddened earth."

The outstanding trait of many great souls consists in their power of admiration of everything in men and nature that is beautiful, fine and strong. This is with some an unconscious religion. We become like the things we admire, and when we express our admirations, they make a deeper print upon our character. Words of admiring praise are drops of light that fall from us, and reflect a peculiar radiance upon our own lives.

We often hear it said of a person, "Oh, I think he appreciates the efforts I make to please him, but you would never know it." In other words, he is suffering from that sad disease, "inarticulate admiration."

Think what the psalmist's outspoken admiration of the sea, the air, the heavens and the physical handiwork of God has brought to the enjoyment of nature! It is my custom to read the Psalms—especially the nineteenth—on shipboard or repeat it on a starry night, on a silent walk beside the sea.

Did you ever feel your heart enlarge, or something moist rise in your eyes, when you said some generous, admiring word to a person, a friend, a fellow workman, an employee? Have you ever realized that a hearty commendation of a good piece of work is better pay than gold to many a soul?

Try today to give vent to your admiration! It will make a difference. Think whether Moses' song describes our lives: "My speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass."

Get Your Loved Ones in the Ark

WEDNESDAY, June 7. Acts 16:31. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, thou and thy house." It is not enough to believe about the Lord Jesus, you must believe on him. The preposition there is very emphatic. It means that you must rest your whole weight on him. You cannot see him, but he is the one solid slab between you and the pit, and as you step out on him, you feel adamant beneath your feet.

The earthquake made the prison tremble. The earth seemed giving way, but the apostle declared that for the soul that trusts Jesus there is a firm standing-ground amid the trials of life, the passage of death, and the trumpet-call to the final judgment.

Do not wait to feel saved; you are saved, if you trust yourself to Jesus. God must know best, and he says so. But mind to bring your house with you.

A working-girl told Mrs. Booth that she wanted to go as a missionary to China. "How many have you at home unconverted?" she asked. "My father, sister, and brother." "Go back and win them to God, and then come to me again."

Every night, when all but she had gone to bed, that girl wrestled in prayer for them, and at the end of twelve months she came to Mrs. Booth to say that they were all safe in the ark. "Now you can go to China."

And thy house! If you are right, they will come right. "Lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee." Claim them from God for his service.

Humble Yet Precious Service

THURSDAY, June 8. Prov. 31:31. "Let her own works praise her in the gates." The New York Sun wrote editorially of Miss Mollie Fancher—shortly after this brave woman closed her eyes upon the narrow confines of her room, where she had been hopelessly bedridden for more than fifty years—that she was a non-producer, contributing nothing of material usefulness to the world for over half a century before her death, but that while her talents and virtues were of the homely, every-day order, they were such as "wisdom seeks in the companions of a hard march."

"If she did not produce shirtwaists or poems, or world-shaking political theories," says the writer, "she did something not less admirable. She set an example of fortitude and cheerfulness in suffering that heartened and upheld many a weary man and woman, that salved many a bruised heart, and put new strength into many a faltering victim of accident and tribulation in a world that no amount of sociology can make easy for most of us."

Such an appreciation should bring inspiration and fresh hope for service to some suffering-laden soul who will take her as a life model; for "she hath done what she could."

"There is no yardstick with which to measure the works of a good man. There is no statistical atlas in which this brave woman's contribution to the peace and happiness and comfort of her kind can be set down. Yet it was real, though imponderable; genuine, though not to be appraised in dollars and cents; worth while, though beyond the purview of efficiency experts; and the fruits of her life refute with overwhelming force the theories of those who set themselves up to correct the illimitable mysteries of nature by the intrusion of their finite minds."

We know of no better encomium to fit such a case than Solomon's description of a woman that feareth the Lord. He says, "She shall be praised. Give her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her in the gates."

Guard Well the Gate of the Heart

FRIDAY, June 9. Phil. 4:8. "Think on these things." When an inventor of some new food wants to popularize it, he will fill the advertising columns with pictures of benignant old men, or lovely old ladies, or sweet-looking little children, all of whom hug to their breasts a box of his farinaceous or other preparation. The obvious inference is that they all got their peculiarly healthy and pleasant appearance, because they had been brought up on that special diet. We are naturally desirous to be good-looking and pleasant people, with pure skins and delightful smiles, and so we sample the new preparation, and add the new food to our menu, with more or less success.

Now, what food is to our physical well-being, the matters which habitually fill our minds are to our spiritual and moral life. You can guess shrewdly what a man's diet is by his appearance; and you can gauge, accurately enough, what a man continually thinks in his heart by what he is. It would be good if men would be as keen about their mental dietary as their physical. The apostle speaks as a philosopher as well as a saint when he says, "Fill your minds with beautiful and true ideals! Whatsoever things are lovely . . . think on these things."

A vast multitude of possible ideals and thoughts are always crowding about the gate of entrance into the mind and heart; and it pays us to maintain a rigid censorship at the gate, turning back those which do not meet Paul's, nay Christ's, requirements. You cannot help the clamor for admission, but by Christ's good Spirit you can turn back the spies.

The Right Path and the Wrong

SATURDAY, June 10. Gal. 6:7. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." A little boy once said to his father, "Do two and two always make four?" The father replied, "Yes, Jack, they always make exactly four; don't forget it, my boy, for that is one of the most majestic and awful facts of the universe." Moral laws, like natural laws, are facts, irrevocable and unrepealable. John Jacob Astor once wanted one of his young men to help load a ship on Sunday. The boy replied, expecting to lose his position, "I cannot break the law of the Lord's Day." That young man afterward became a partner in the firm.

How different the one who listened to the tempter, who said, "What's the harm? No one will ever know it; you can pay it back. Take the money." That young man found a felon's cell.

Yes, vice is always vicious; virtue always ennobling. Drinking means drunkenness; dishonesty, desolation. It was said of a rich man's son, "He has everything but moral principle. The legacy did not leave him that."

Men well know the path they are walking in. They know if they sow to the flesh, they will reap corruption. If the care of the body takes precedence of that of the soul, both will be wrecked. Environment, culture, education and social reforms are the popular words of today. Men are not saying "Is it right or wrong?" but "Is it sterilized?"

Let the President Act

HOW swift are the processes of war, contrasted with those of peace! War marches with giant strides, peace with slow and timid footsteps. Yet peace, when the goal is clearly in sight, can outstrip even war.

The past week has been one of steadily growing peace sentiment on both sides of the Atlantic. Peace rumors persist, although the war goes on. There have been various happenings in high diplomatic quarters that give added strength to the intimations already in circulation that peace—long wished for and fervently prayed for—may be nearer than we think.

The President and his cabinet, as telegrams report, have discussed peace in session. What they said or did is covered with secrecy, but it is reasonable to suppose that they regard the situation as more favorable than at any previous time for this government taking a definite step toward aiding in bringing the war to a close. It is understood that the Pope has urged our government to act now. Further, it has been stated that Ambassador Gerard has forwarded, by a special messenger, documents from the German Imperial Chancellor which are believed to have an important bearing on the question of European peace. It is even said, unofficially, that the three great powers, Germany, France and England, have made provisional appointments of delegates to a Peace Congress, and that all are looking forward to an armistice early in the summer.

With such unmistakable indications from Europe, and with an overwhelming peace sentiment prevailing in America, why should we continue to hesitate? Never was the time more opportune than now for this government to offer its services. Surely the time for "watchful waiting" is past and the hour for action has arrived.

Europe in its extremity is looking to us for help. It is eagerly hoping to see the first signs of that aid which we promised to render when the heavy burden of war could no longer be borne. But the government at Washington is silent. For twenty-two months our nation has watched the struggle. It has taken no step to lessen it or to mitigate its horrors, but has even fed fuel to the flames by its exports of munitions. We have expressed, in fine swelling phrases, our desire for peace; but those glowing sentiments were for domestic consumption alone. They meant nothing to the perishing millions of Europe. We raised no hand to help. Instead, we are even now buttressing ourselves in the warlike spirit of preparedness, although no European power thinks of threatening us. We are wasting precious time in not grasping the opportunity to place ourselves at the head of all the neutral nations in a great effort for peace.

The best thought of our people—and that includes all who are not consumed with that so-called Americanism which blinds us to anything beyond the narrow limits of our own selfish interests—is that the time for President Wilson to take definite action looking to a concerted effort to end the war is here—now—TODAY. He has been appealed to by innumerable American citizens to do this without further delay. The appeal is echoed from Holland, Switzerland, Austria and England; it is emphasized by pastors in Germany and by the World Alliance of Churches. Only a few days ago a notable meeting was held in New York at which the conviction was expressed that the time was ripe for peace proposals from America, and that these would be welcomed by the belligerents. It was the unanimous view that the statesmanlike course would be for the President to act now.

In view of all the circumstances of the situation here and abroad, for us to be longer silent, and to hold back our hand when Europe stands ready to grasp it, would be criminal folly. It is now or never that we must act.

We might enumerate other important indications which show that the belligerent powers are hoping for friendly aid on the road to peace. No single belligerent will take the initiative. German diplomats and the German press have been most outspoken in their discussion of peace terms and prospects. Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg has given his views in statesmanlike terms. In the Reichstag, on more than one occasion recently, the subject of peace has been approached tentatively in the debates, the members recognizing that it is becoming the supreme topic. In France and Russia the leaders say little. Sir Edward Grey, the controller of Britain's foreign policy, has seized the opportunity afforded by the peace rumors to spread his views in defense of his own political course—a course which he has repeatedly but unconvincingly attempted to justify.

As all the world knows, the language of diplomacy is merely a veil to conceal the real truth. The diplomatic mind works in burrowing circles, feinting to disguise its actual convictions. For the true expression of the desire for peace, we must look to the people themselves. Their insistent demand has been growing to proportions during these last few months. This is equally true of all the nations whose populations have been decimated and impoverished by the gigantic conflict, and who, in spite of official repression, are now making themselves heard. They have reached the limit of suffering and hardship and bereavement, and now their rulers recognize that an end must be made of this bloody and ruinous struggle, and that quickly. The people are looking back over the many battlefields of these terrible twenty-two months and asking, "How many more of our sons must we send to slaughter? Will they rob us of all, save the crippled and the aged?" They have appealed to God and now they are looking across the Atlantic to the one nation which has declared itself the friend of peace and of all combatants alike. Dare we disappoint them now? To do so would be to confess to the world that we want the war to go on; that we want to keep on making profit from the slaughter; that our neutrality is hollow and utterly selfish.

There is but one honorable and righteous course open for us now. Casting all obstacles aside, we must stand out as the champion of peace, the adversary of war, and we must be ready to go to the extreme limit in this cause.

A Brave Preacher

"I NOW know that it was said by one who was supposed to know Trinity traditions that if I meant to preach and lead along the lines of that sermon I would certainly fail. The text of the sermon was, 'For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified.'" "The suspicion has once or twice crossed my mind that there are those on the vestry who take the view that I was called to the parish to be conformed to its standards rather than to try to conform the parish to the standards of Jesus Christ."

These words are taken from the public explanation made by the Rev. Mercer Green Johnston of the difficulties that have arisen between himself and the vestry of Trinity Church, Newark, N. J., of which he is the rector. One of his parishioners is quoted as having added this testimony: "His trouble with the vestry lay in the fact that he insisted that the Gospel be applied to every relation in life, including business, big or little." Another parishioner declared: "Mercer Johnston is the stuff that Savonarola was made of. He has thrown over a $10,000,000 parish for conscience' sake."

In another paragraph of his statement Mr. Johnston declares:

> Jesus Christ was in dead earnest when he said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." Jesus Christ was in dead earnest when he said, "Whosoever shall save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it." Once more, God has made known to me, along with many who today stand outside of organized Christianity, that he expects the Gospel of Jesus Christ to reach out and up and down into all the relations of human life, absolutely without exception—personal, family, social, industrial, ecclesiastical, political—and to be both preached and applied in practical fashion; to the end that Jesus Christ may be the Saviour of society as well as the Saviour of the individual, and so bring into being the real brotherhood of man to which he looked forward so passionately, and for which he gave his all, and bade his disciples to pray and to do and dare all.

These are plain, brave words. And for the new church that is gradually emerging out of the stress of these present troublous times they are the kind of words that every minister must be brave enough to utter. The real forward movement of the church of Jesus in its work of reconstructing the world cannot and will not stop because of the worldliness, the selfishness and the apathy of formal Christians. Real Christians will choose real men to preach to them, and these real preachers and real Christians will make a real Church that will do real work for Christ and will eventually bring the world to his feet.

The Irish Martyrs

HISTORY records few acts so stupid and so unjust as the recent wholesale executions of the leaders of the Irish rebellion. Acts as unjust have been committed; acts which were in themselves as stupid. But the stupidity of this act at this particular time is immeasurable. England and her allies have been trying to make the world believe that they stand for a higher and truer type of freedom than do their enemies. Sir Edward Grey, in a long and careful interview reprinted in a recent number of the New York Times, states this claim seriously and earnestly: that England is fighting for an international method that shall end all war a for a true and real type of liberty. In claiming th this has been the past spirit of Britain Sir Edward a ears for the moment to have forgotten the Transva not to go farther back than the present century.

There are many peculiarly ugly and dist sing features in the whole regrettable affair. First all, the men might have been granted the conside tion usually extended to prisoners of war. This was esir- able from every point of view, rather than to r nove them with swift and savage slaughter. A ther shocking element was the youth and pure id lism of the victims. Patrick Pearse, president the short-lived republic, was schoolmaster auth and poet. Joseph Plunkett, twenty-five years old, as a poet and editor, a man of unusual attainment as a scholar. Daly was but twenty-four years old. V liam Pearse, thirty years old, was tutor and sc ptor. O'Hanrahan was also an editor. F. Sheehy Skeffi ton, one of the victims, seems to have been entirely uilt- less of participation in the present rebellion. I was also an editor, and had resided for some t e in America. Worst of all was the admission in rlia- ment that Skelfington and two other journalis had been executed "without the knowledge of the n tary authorities, and before martial law was actu y in operation." Joseph Plunkett was married few hours before his execution, his bride wearing w ow's weeds. Heartrending stories are told of the a uish of the mothers and wives of the executed men And many signs point to altogether unreasonable s rity in hastening the executions.

The unwisdom of the British government's arsh methods with the Irish rebels lies not only in t fact that it lessens her international influence for tice, liberty and peace, but that it resurrects and en gizes in the people of her dependencies the very thi she tries to kill. It would seem that statesmen ou t to realize by this time that you cannot kill a mov nent by killing its leaders. This is what Herod an Nero tried to do with Christianity, but the blood tl fell from the necks of their victims became the see rom which hosts of new believers arose, and in les than three centuries, instead of the Roman Empire ving conquered Christianity Christianity had con ered the Empire. The method has been tried with s olars as well as with saints, but history shows that u do not kill a scientific or sociological principle by lling the men who teach it. And what is true of sai and scholars is true of patriots. To kill them simp pro- duces more patriots. Of course nations and rac have been subdued and exterminated by wholesale sla hter or overwhelming military conquest, but to l the spirit of revolt by killing the leaders of rev is a thing that cannot be done.

As has been clearly pointed out recently by eral scholarly writers, the secret of universal pea and brotherhood will come by expanding the sp t of patriotism, broadening it from province to tion, from nation to confederations of nations, till shal embrace all the world.

England has missed a rare chance of sublimati Irish patriotism to this broad and high purpose. Her t bles with Ireland are more acute than ever. And has added a score of earnest faces and staunch s ls to the already crowded gallery of Irish martyr-h oes.

Help the Chinese Orphans

WE like the good old-fashioned wor lov- offering." It gives an added grace to gift when the latter is prompted by a hea that is filled with the spirit of kindness and Ch tlike sympathy. It betokens an appreciation of t fact that giving may be made a joyful privilege, an that in such a case, as Lowell has beautifully writte n his "Vision of Sir Launfal," the generous one

> "Who gives himself with his alms feeds th — > Himself, his hungering neighbor, and ."

Among those of our readers who have respo ed to our appeal in behalf of our little orphans in Chi , are several who send "love-offerings." There a 697 of these little Chinese waifs who are to be pr ided with food, shelter and training for the nex hre months, and the remittance must be forwarde the missionaries at once. The war has brought har imes to China, as to other lands. Our friends can p u in this emergency by sending us a "love-offer " in aid of the little orphans. Churches, Sunday s ools Bible classes, Christian Endeavorers and ther should have a share in this beautiful leve- lence. Individual gifts will also be welcomed An love-offering, however small, will be most acce able The money is needed at once, and we trust our end will act promptly. Send all gifts to the Cines Orphan Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, N. Y.

So erers Condemned to Death

A MAN and woman in Cuba have just been condemned to death for the murder of an old man. The deed was done not for alousy, nor revenge, nor for his moiv, but for his life's blood as a mec inal remedy. The man and the wo n were sorcerers, and deceived the ublic with their magic arts, which the claimed were by superhuman age y. The woman began seriously ill. According the rites of a certain diallical sect it was tho ht that some of the old an's blood would cure her. So they killed him 'or at purpose. Poor dend creatures, companions and servants of the evil spir how much they are o l pitied for their menal lelusions and moral wro s, as well as conlened for their crime! The law declared they wer mentally competent, and mposed the sentence po them. The old man's lo did not bring life but lea . There is One whose ife lood cures the sick and ying soul. All of the Boo all of the Gospel, all of e for both worlds, is n led in these words of our Lord himself: "Whoso eate my flesh, and drinkth y blood, hath eternal ife nd I will raise him up t e last day." (John : .)

J EPH E. WIDENER Philadelphia, who 'ecetly acquired the fano Mazarin tapestry ror the J. Pierpont Morgan ollection for a price ep ed to have been $600,00 has just purchased mo er of the famous exm es in the same collecio "The Crucifixion," by a Orley, for $200,000. Thi makes Mr. Widener he ossessor of the two ap tries which connoiseu hold to be unsurasd in America. The ap try just bought is en ally known among art ov s as the Dollfus Cruciixi . It is wonderfully ie vith gold. It once beon d to the magnificent Be ick and Alba collecion It is a few years ate in date than the Ma rin tapestry, having been woven bc 1525. The design was the work of Be ard Van Orley, who is said to av originated more tapestries than ny ther man. njoy Perpetual Serenade

A establishment in Cincinnati which employs 300 men and women has ins led phonographs of latest improvene in all parts of the building, from wh pour forth the sweetest strains f sic to regale the workers at their as . There may have been an ingredient of benevolence in wanting to delight the toilers, but it is understood that the introduction of the music is a matter of expediency, as the men and women will turn out more work with the inspiration of the melody. The psychologist as well as the political economist will watch the experiment with much interest. Music is a great inspiration to patriotic and heroic deeds. Napoleon made great use of it in his campaigns. Lincoln thought the bands were as necessary as the cannon in the war. And so do the nations today. The value of music as an inspiration to the highest thought and noblest endeavor is recognized in the divine appointment of the superb musical service in the Mosaic dispensation, and in the glorious melodies of the Christian Church. Music is the strong right arm of the pulpit in bringing men to God. There is this mention of the appointment of music to a part in the services of the Lord's house: "And David spake to the chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren to be the singers with instruments of music." (I Chron. 15 : 16.)

A Curious Ice Mine

THERE is an ice mine in Coudersport, Pa. It was discovered eighteen years ago by the owner of a farm, who noticed a singular coldness in one place. He dug for silver and found a mine or cave forty feet deep and from ten to twelve feet in diameter. Geologists cannot explain why the mine is there or how it is that, contrary to nature, the ice freezes in the summer and melts in the winter. The ice is formed from a cold mist which comes through openings all the way from the top to the bottom of the shaft. As soon as warm weather comes, frost appears on the walls of the shaft and soon tiny icicles form rapidly, and huge icicles two feet thick stretch like crystal fingers from the top to the bottom of the cave. The ice begins to freeze in May and to thaw in October. This mine the farmer's wife uses as a refrigerator to keep food fresh in the summer, and as a place to keep vegetables from freezing in the winter. A shade was put over the mine, but it had to be taken away, as the ice melted when the sun's rays were shut out. We would hardly believe such a story, but so reliable an authority as the Scientific American vouches for its truth. The action of the ice mine is contrary to that of nature in melting ice and snow in summer as thus described: "Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid; what time they wax warm, they vanish, when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place." (Job 6 : 16, 17.)

Idaho National Park, "The Switzerland of America"

IT is expected that the new Idaho National Park will shortly take its place by legislative enactment as one of the greatest natural show places on the continent when this wonderland of mountains, lakes, streams and forests in the heart of Idaho will be set apart and dedicated for all time as a pleasure ground for the people of the whole country It is to become an additional jewel to that strand that reaches from Colorado to the Pacific Coast. All the great parks of the West, including the Rocky Mountain in Colorado, the Yellowstone in Wyoming and Idaho, the Idaho in the Sawtooth Mountains in Idaho, the Glacier in Washington, the Yosemite in California, the Grand Canyon in Arizona, and others of lesser note, are to be connected by a system of fine automobile highways; good roads and trails are to be constructed in the parks, and good hotel and camping facilities are to be provided for all tourists. "This section of the Sawtooth range is unusually striking in mountain sculpture, and is a brilliant composite example of the characteristics of three of the main mountain ranges in the United States The southern portion strongly resembles the Rocky Mountains in Colorado; the middle section is a counterpart of the Sierras in California, and the northern end is a rugged brother of the Cascade Range in Washington The lakes are rare in their brilliant transparency, reflecting the mountains and the black pine fringing their edges, making most inviting places for campers and tourists to rest and enjoy nature in all her glory." The mountains in this section are bold, jagged and precipitous. From a distance the range gives the impression of a great inverted crosscut saw, hence the name. Mount Hyndman, the highest peak in Idaho, 12,078 feet, is found here within easy reach of the end of the railroad at Ketchum. Three rivers of inestimable value for irrigation in the valleys far below have their common source in the mountains of the proposed park. They are the Salmon, the Boisé and the Payette. These streams, together with a number of smaller ones, swarm with trout and other game fish. This is equally true of the lakes, some sixty in number. The redfish, found in but few places on the continent, is common here. It has given its name to the largest of the lakes. Much of the land to be included in this new national park is now included in forest reserves. Forest rangers have already done much in the way of constructing roads and trails. They have their stations well scattered throughout the territory, with telephones here and there, so that the tourist, even when completely swallowed up in this wilderness, is never far out of reach of civilization. It is beautiful and wise for our nation to have these places for rest, recreation and communion with nature and nature's God. Many a devout soul in the new Idaho Park will realize somewhat the meaning of the words, "And the glory of the Lord abode upon Mount Sinai." (Ex. 24 : 16.)

Shelter Island Deer Drive

A HUNDRED deer were charged with depredations on farm crops on Shelter Island, Long Island, and were condemned to death by a sentence of the court. The lovers of the wild cried out against the massacre of the innocents and begged the state game authorities to capture and transport them to the region of Saranac Lake and set them free. The authorities built a high wire enclosure and the first week in May began the effort to capture them. They caught fourteen, three of them dead, and seven of the remaining thirteen dying after capture, literally frightened to death. On May 9 the final drive was made. Five deer were driven from their hiding-places for nearly three miles to the wired barrier at Sachem's Neck, but they refused to take to the water, where provision had been made to capture them, and, doubling on their tracks, forced their way through the lines of drivers and made their escape. Byron A. Cameron of Saranac Lake, N. Y., division chief in charge of the drive on the island, said: "We are lucky to have captured fourteen by this method. It is unfortunate that the deer are physically unable to overcome the effects of terror due to the drives, and of the eleven we caught alive, only six have survived." The six deer were crated and sent to the public park of Utica. This is said to have been the first drive of the kind in the country and is likely to be the last. It was a fitting finale to what appears a foolish performance. It is not likely that there were a hundred wild deer on Shelter Island. There is scarcely anything that is as easy to lie about as the size of a fish or the number of deer in a herd, especially if they get away. Shelter Island is one of the most beautiful summer resorts in America, and instead of allowing such a silly sensation to mature, it would have paid the citizens there to have adopted the herd of beautiful creatures, and fed, tamed, and protected it as an attractive feature of the resort. The refusal of the five to enter the trap calls to mind the escape of a deer from its pursuers thus employed as a figure: "Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter." (Prov. 6 : 5.)

Platinum Found in Colombia

ACCORDING to the United States consular service at Cartagena, platinum is found in Colombia near the headwaters of the Atrato and San Juan Rivers in the Intendencia del Choco. Nearly all the streams of this region yield the metal. The resources and opportunities of the South American continent are attracting the attention of the business interests of the world. And what a fruitful field it will be for missionary endeavor! The country answers the description: "A land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass." (Deut. 8 : 9.)

Nature's Bungalow-Builders

By W. LIVINGSTON LARNED

WE saw the building of an odd little bungalow yesterday.

Master craftsmen were at work upon it. Their efforts came natural to them. One by one the quaint integral parts fell into place, until there it stood before us, complete in every detail and ready for occupancy.

We never appreciated before how marvelously interesting this contracting business could be.

And, as should be the case in most things of life, a moral had been woven into the fabric of this honest task.

THE well-mated birds had drawn up their little plans; had settled all differences as to location of butler's pantry, spare-room and the like, and were engaged in critically examining every piece of vacant property.

It was done with amazing earnestness. They peered, with inquisitive little eyes, into this place and into that—behind the big green shutters and under protecting eaves. It was in no sense a hurried, careless decision.

To them, as far as we could make out, settling on a proper location was of prime importance.

It is not too much to suppose that this problem received methodical analysis. But, at last, with noisy, happy proclamation, they had an end of it—they agreed, with no further domestic quibbling, that a certain crotch in a certain fine old tree was ideal.

THE female of the species, with a certain characteristic self-assurance, gave orders. It was much as if she had twittered in her unanswerable bird logic:

"Here! get busy, Mr. Bird! I know how this house should be constructed, and my ideals should prevail. Am I not to abide here? Is it not to be a cradle for our family? Please permit my judgment to prevail. Now, then, quit fussing with your feathers and run down by the chicken yard. You'll find some soft feathers. Put in your order for a load of them. In the meanwhile, sticks—small twigs—get a hustle on you, now. Spring is in the air. I heard sap singing in a dogwood tree just the other day, and the peach buds are swelling with perfume!"

AND so we watched from a vantage-point above. It seemed a sacrilege to peep through the lace curtains of our own nursery and mark the daily toil of these chattery, takative little home-builders.

Pretty soon the foundation was up and a sort of straw scaffolding was distinctly visible. Compact, ingeniously constructed, it was as if master craftsmen, indeed, had taken this contract. The spirit-level of bird intuition had set it surely and squarely in the crotch of the old apple tree, where no winds might hope to tear it free.

It must have been a "time job," too, we warrant. No loafing, no tarrying over the odd jobs, no loitering from yard to property site on the part of the industrious artisans, with their beaks full of material.

Far from the lure of the trade union and unbiased by financial gain, Mr. and Mrs. Bird attended to that task in great style.

As a consequence, it was up before we knew it—up, and ready for occupancy. Mrs. B. scurried around the outside, tidying up, tucking in a straw here and a twig there, and the welcome sun gave it a coat of brown tan, as nobly as ever a painter boasted from his world of pots and kegs.

THE inside finishing was not neglected, as you may well imagine. Oh, such feathery, downy white and gray effects—the crack filler was from beneath the wing of a molting white leghorn and the varnishing was done by a sleek little yellow littlebeak.

Above and around and over and under, the glory of blossoms suddenly appeared. It was as if the old apple tree, in a last happy effort to be young again, had showered pink and white confetti from a secret treasure-trove. And on that last day, before the keys of the house were handed over to the occupants and the bungalow was formally accepted, the transformed owners sat up among the creamy flowers and sang, until the echo of that song thrilled in our appreciative ears.

A Little Mother came and was gone again, through many countless golden hours, and the shabbier gray mate, preening the building-dust out of his coa was never far away.

Yes, they had moved in! There was magi roof of occupancy. Sunlight, streaming down an e of delicate green leaves, haloed the spot where t tiny eggs were resting.

We kept faithful vigil, as the springtime grew pace and the apple tree put on quite a respectable wa coat of leaves. And before long, as Life wills it, a the Wise Father decrees, the bungalow vibrated wi new hearts beating and new mouths to fill and fuzz ittle bundles of weak youth rimming the feathery n t, as roses line a garden walk.

Again the air twittered and chattered.

Again there was activity in the crotch the apple tree; again two busy bundles of Bird ame and went.

These were marketing excursions, of course, d in the clubby sun-parlor of the tree-bungalow, hen mother and father were away, six of the hu riest beaks in all the world, we guess, opened to lear April sky, while the sunshine filtered down e so much wine from a golden cup.

WE had built our wee home in much the ame spirit. There had been searching and w dering and sacrifice. There had been scrimping an saving and the piling of one twig upon another. here had been spring, with white apple blossoms. And, finally, there had been a nest full of babies, cal g to us for food.

God's ways are wondrous, indeed; but most w derful when Spring shakes the soft rains and fai buds from her hair and—

Builds for all the universe of man and bea and bird.

Question of Religious Appropriations

THE most fundamental issue pending in the National Capital—one that threatens the very tap-root of American institutions like a deadly worm—is the sectarian appropriations involved in four bills, three of which, the Indian Bill, the Philippine Bill, and the Porto Rico Bill, are on the calendar. The other—the radical remedy, yet in committee—is the Sisson constitutional amendment (H. J. Res. 137) to prohibit both state and national governments from making such appropriations. For twenty-one years, since Protestants renounced as un-American their church and state entanglement for joint education of the Indians, Congress, in manifest fear of the Catholic vote, has continued appropriations to Catholic schools solely on the claim of "treaty rights," which, if genuine, might have been secured through the courts. During most of the same period, executive officers have been turning Indian, Philippine and Porto Rican funds into Catholic channels on other "claims," which should have been adjudged by courts, not by political candidates for reelection or reappointment. This exchange of a solid church vote for offices and appropriations poisons the very fountains of democracy. It is a cunning form of bribery which is growing to alarming proportions.

The Indian Rights Association has long fought Indian sectarian appropriations, but one of its officers told the writer that Protestant churches had given them so little support that they had almost "lost heart." This is no doubt due to the fact that most Protestants have a deep dislike for religious conflicts in politics. Church against church is first cousin to the hated "church and state," emancipation from which is our chief preeminence above other nations of the first rank; and we have achieved it without going to the other extreme, as France has done, of dominating the church by the state, even in some matters ecclesiastical.

The United States Senate has corrected what it would be mild language to call a "joker" in the Philippine Bill, which, as reported by committees of both houses and passed by the last House, prohibited appropriations to "sectarian institutions as such." The prohibition is now absolute. But the subject was wholly omitted in the Porto Rico Bill, for which a similar prohibition is now asked. The Senate Indian Committee has approved the demand for a $250,000 appropriation to provide public non-sectarian education for all Indians who are now receiving government support in Catholic schools, so far as they will receive it, but this amendment has yet to be acted on in the House, and is liable to die in committee, unless public sentiment appeals in its behalf. Never has Congress been so unanimous in anything as in its fear of the "Catholic vote" and the "anti-Catholic vote," both of which it seeks to escape by avoiding a vote on religious appropriations. Year after year these appropriations have been continued, when one courageous man in either house could have put them out on a point of order. This year it can be done only by vote. Thirty-eight members of the previous Congress were retired by the "anti-Catholic vote," and we know not how many by the Catholic vote. True Americans should say each to his own congressman and both senators: "In the interest of justice and peace and American principles, we ask submission of the Sisson constitutional amendment, prohibiting religious appropriations in the interest of any church or denomination, and meantime ask immediate legislation to prevent such appropriations among Indians and in the Phil pines and Porto Rico. Protest should o be made against the bills in the Hou Post Office Committee, intended t give power to the Postmaster Gene l to exclude from the mails paper that criticize the Catholic Church, ina uch as the courts afford sufficient dress against any abuse of the freedom the press.

Post-Office Gospel Mission

THERE is a small Gospel mission, which is seeking to help bring about in China the fulfilment of the promise of Isa. 49 : 12. We are told that many shall be gathered into Christ's kingdom, some from "the North," some from "the West"—"and these from the land of China"—which the word Sinim is said to mean. It is the post office people of that great land, whom the missionaries are seeking to bring to the feet of the Saviour. And we find them, in every part of China, ready to receive our message.

It may be asked, How do you reach them, if it is a small mission? The answer is, they are postal officials, and it is in great measure through the post that we are brought into touch with them. As in the early days of Christianity the old Roman roads, stretching in all directions, made a way for the spread of the Gospel, so in our day we believe, and have proved, that God can use the ever increasing postal system as a means of carrying the good news of salvation to those who have never yet had the opportunity of believing it. "F how shall they believe in Him of who they have not heard?"

Through our little "Gospel ail" magazine, which goes to the post offices throughout the Chinese E pire, we have the great privilege of s ding the glad tidings to many intellige and thoughtful Chinamen who ha no other means of spiritual help. may be they are a hundred miles fro any missionary; but the "Gospel ail" finds them out, because they are stal officials, and, as every numbe puts them in communication wit our missionary at Shanghai, they can, after reading these messages, w e to him of their soul's needs. A good many, from all parts of China take advantage of this; and very to hing is the soul-hunger revealed in hese communications. One man reg ered his letter to insure its reachi our missionary—Mr. Heal—because contained that all-important qu tion, "What must I do to be saved?"

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"HENRY H . . . . ., Jr., is conceded to be a bad boy, and believes in living up to his re tation——" he short newspaper article began th way, and went on, with a singular la of humor or feeling or consideration, to ll the story of the boy who is conced to be bad.

he story was a sordid one of a little fe w who was sent to the New York Ju nile Asylum, and who escaped after st ing a revolver and a pocketbook be nging to the matron of the home. A r he was exhausted from running an had used up the six shots in the re lver firing at his pursuers, he was ca ured and taken back to the asylum. A then, rather pitifully, he spoke.

"I just gotta be bad sometimes," said H ry. "I'm a bad boy."

was reading the article aloud to the gi who shared my seat in the train. A the end of it I looked at her questi ngly. "Well?" I asked.

he girl who shared my seat glanced at e a bit triumphantly. "They ought to t boys like that in prison," she told m "Why, he admitted himself that he as bad. It's dangerous to have bo like that where they can escape."

I DIDN'T answer her, for my mind had gone back a number of years, an I saw a little girl who had been told th she was naughty. A little girl with a r-stained face and rebellious eyes. A tle girl who sat lonesomely in the co er wondering what other naughty th gs she could do. "If they think I' bad," she reasoned, "I will be bad. I'l lide down the banisters, and I'll tear m lress, and I'll take cookies out of the pa ry, and I'll—I'll run away!"

The little girl did run away—a matter of several blocks—and then, alarmed at the bigness of the world, she ran home again to the arms of a frightened family. When asked why she had tried to get lost she sobbed, "You said I was bad."

With a start I came back to the present and the little girl who had been myself faded away into the distance, while the girl who shared my seat loomed large at my side.

"But don't you understand," I said to her, "that the boy couldn't be blamed—altogether? Don't you understand that the boy was only young, and that his mind was open to impressions, and that he had always been told that he was bad? It's human nature for people to try to live up to other people's ideals of them, and the little boy had been told so many times that he was not a good little boy that he didn't want to disappoint people. Stealing the money and the revolver was only one of the characteristics that had been made a part of him. For he was officially conceded to be a bad boy. Don't you understand?"

"No, I don't understand," answered the girl. "Why should any one try to be bad? If they were worth while they would try to be good and change people's opinion of them. No, I don't understand."

The girl's argument was unanswerable. She didn't understand, and with a sigh I realized that she never could.

I WENT to school with a little boy who was notoriously poor in arithmetic. Simple addition and subtraction were vast trenches to be captured in his everyday work. Fractions proved to be his Waterloo. The teacher used to tell the class on numerous occasions how very poor Johnnie was in number work, and Johnnie would hang his head sheepishly and turn in a foolishly written little paper, smudged with the mark of tears and the print of small fingers.

And then one day we had a new teacher, a young, pretty teacher just out of Normal School, a teacher whose ideas had not as yet conformed to system. When she saw Johnnie's sad little attempt at fractions she didn't laugh. She came down to his desk and stood with her hand on his shoulder, and said, "Johnnie, dear, you make exactly the same mistakes that I used to make when I went to school. Suppose you stay in for a few moments after the rest are dismissed and let me tell you how I learned to do fractions. I know you will be easy to teach."

Johnnie stayed after school; he stayed after school for several days. And then Johnnie began to learn. His home work was not incorrect any more and the mark of tears no longer grimed his foolish little papers. At the end of the year Johnnie's marks were more than passing marks, and his mind was beginning to see light in the midst of a dark tangle of figures. Johnnie is teaching school himself now, and he is teaching mathematics.

I don't know just how Johnnie accounts for his efficiency in a subject that was unintelligible to him. But I was an onlooker and I know. I saw the gleam of hope and interest in the little boy's eyes when the pretty new teacher patted his shoulder and told him that she knew he would be easy to teach. I saw him during the many hours that he scribbled away on paper trying to live up to her confidence in him. She believed, where others had not believed, and he didn't want to disappoint her.

JOHNNIE'S case is not unlike the case of Henry H . . ., although to the casual reader of newspaper articles they might seem as widely separated as the north and south poles. But both boys were merely doing what was expected of them. The expectations, in the case of H. H., were negative.

A great deal depends on what people expect of you. The girl who has strayed away from home and home influences might be led back again if only she were praised for her good qualities, instead of censured for her faults. The boy who hates his work might like it if he were told that he did the work well. A task might be easier to accomplish if people assured you that they knew you could do even the most difficult things.

If boys, young boys who are filled with the spirit of adventure and excitement that often leads them away from the right, were only told that they were good boys, a little thoughtless, perhaps, but—well, good boys, they would probably try very hard to live up to the reputation they had been given. But tell a boy he's bad and all the sullenness and unhappiness of his nature will rise to the surface, and he will admit that he is bad, and that he doesn't care!

When folk see that we have formed an opinion of them, they reason that it is less trouble to conform to that opinion than to upset all of our ideas. They don't want to disappoint us. So then, what do we want the boys and girls of our homes to be . . . "conceded to be bad"?

Alaska and the Preparedness Program

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

AS a naval base, Alaska is a key to the northern Pacific. As far as fuel for our battleships is concerned, it is the key to our wh e Pacific coast, as well as to Hawaii an the Philippines. Indeed, its coal an oil resources may some day decide wh her we are to have victory or defeat in war with Japan.

actically the only good steaming co in our Pacific coast territories lies he in Alaska. The Asiatic fleet of th future will need in the neighborho of a half million tons per annum, an the coaling stations of the Hawa n Islands and of the Philippines wi be supplied from here. It is of en mous importance that the harbors ne which the coal lies be amply protected, and defenses should be at once in tuted for all the approaches to R rrection Bay, the terminus of U e Sam's railroad. That road leads to he Matanuska coal fields, and the br ch line opening them will be compl ed this year. The coal will come fr those fields to Seward, and it will al go down to Anchorage, which is pe aps a hundred miles nearer the co beds. The latter port will have to be rotected from Cook Inlet, that wide an deep bay up which ships can now sa to within seventy-five miles of our be naval coal supplies.

nother important harbor is that of C dova, where this letter is written. It within a short distance of the B ng River coal fields, which have gr t beds of bituminous and anthracite, an also within easy reach of the K alla oil fields, the petroleum of wh h is said to be as good as that of P nsylvania and eminently fit for the m ing of gasoline. Indeed, they are m ing gasoline there now and shipping it Cordova for sale. Cordova is also within 200 miles by an excellent railroad of the best copper mines of the whole world. These are the famous Kennecott properties, which are now producing millions of dollars' worth of copper a year at a cost of less than 5 cents a pound. Copper is one of the great necessities of modern warfare, and any nation that has hold of the Cordova harbor can control all the copper it would need in any war of the future. Moreover, by building a railroad only thirty-eight miles long Cordova could have access to some of the best coal on the hemisphere, and also to the Katalla oil fields, which would supply it with gasoline, now the life-blood of modern warfare.

This port, by the fast warships of today, is within less than three days of our Puget Sound cities. The shortest distance is only about 1,200 miles; and Japan, for instance, has three dreadnoughts of over 27,000 tons each which could make that journey in less than two days. These ships are the Kirishima, the Haruna and the Hiyei, each of which has 68,000 horsepower and can make twenty-seven knots per hour. Japan is ten or twelve days from Seattle. It is much less from Cordova, and the advantage of any of the Asiatic nations having a naval base in Alaska can be easily seen.

I have referred to Japan because she is the only Oriental nation that needs to be taken into account at this present writing. That she should be considered I find plenty of evidence. Everywhere I go I hear stories of how the Japanese are spying Alaska. Like the two men whom Joshua the son of Nun sent out from Shittim to Jericho, they seem to be going out secretly and using all sorts of methods to learn the lay of the land. As far as possible their tracks are kept covered.

I am told that the Japanese are now employed in all the fishing stations along the coast. I saw a large number at Ketchikan and in other parts of southeastern Alaska. They are to be found at all the salmon canneries, and here and there about the mines. They were employed in the Bering River coal fields before the government closed them, and they have worked in all capacities in the mines at Kennecott and about Cordova. They have also been employed in the oil fields of Katalla, and I doubt not they have full information as to the other oil and coal deposits of the territory.

One of the last Japanese stories I heard relates to a Seattle man who was operating in the Bering coal fields before they were closed by the government. This man had a cook from Japan, whom he called Henry, and who he boasted was the best cook in Alaska. He was always talking of Henry's capabilities. He said he could not only cook, but could make excellent sketches, and that he was able to keep a diary and make all sorts of notes. He was so reliable and trustworthy that his employer sent him on all kinds of missions and gave him the care of his papers.

As time passed on the man, seeing the fate of his coal property, left Alaska in disgust and came to Seattle to engage in the wholesale fish business. He had then no further use for Henry the cook, and he dismissed him with the best of recommendations.

Then the Japanese-Russian war broke out, and the agents of the Mikado came to the United States to buy food for the army. One of them came to Seattle to purchase a large consignment of fish. He was referred to the former coal miner. He called, and when he appeared in the office, lo! he was Henry. He was such a good cook that he had risen to be one of the confidential agents of the Japanese government, and in the war department at Tokyo I doubt not there are maps and plans of the Bering River coal fields which Henry had made.

ANOTHER instance was given me by one of the scientific experts of the United States government who had received an assignment to go from Juneau to Seward late one September not long ago. The cold weather had already set in at the West, and the man dreaded the trip. He did not expect to have fellow passengers, but on going to the steamer he found that one of the men on board was a Japanese naval attaché who had once been stationed in Washington. I shall call the man Lieutenant Commander Itogawa, although that is not his real name.

The scientist asked the lieutenant commander where he was going and was told that he was making the round trip to Seldovia, the farthest point to which steamers go in the winter. It is a fishing station at the southwestern end of the Kenai Peninsula, and the ships going there visit Cordova and Seward and all the other important points along the coast.

Before the steamer left Juneau the governor of the territory came down to the wharf and was introduced to the lieutenant commander. He asked him where he was going, and, upon his replying that he was bound for Seldovia, wanted to know if he had yet secured a license. The Japanese was dumfounded. He replied that he did not know a license was required by a foreigner to travel on American vessels going to Alaska, and seemed greatly relieved when the governor explained that he meant a license to hunt for big game, which was the only reason he could possibly think that any one would care to visit Seldovia at that time of the year. The Japanese replied that he was making the trip merely for the sea voyage and for pleasure.

My scientific friend became fairly well acquainted with the Japanese during the voyage, but not well enough to ask personal questions. The Japanese did not volunteer anything further as to his business, but the scientist says that he had a camera with him and made numerous photographs everywhere. He took snapshots of every bay and channel, and kept a notebook, in which he jotted down voluminous memoranda in Japanese characters. His notebook was evidently precious, for it was fastened to a steel chain, riveted to a leather belt, buckled about his waist. The lieutenant commander had the latest charts of our geodetic survey with him, and he made notes upon them as he went. He was probably getting full information about the coast in case it might be needed by his navy at any time in the future.

BY the recent developments on the battlefields of Europe the oil fields of Alaska have become of enormous importance. Gasoline is an absolute necessity for modern warfare. It has to be used in motor car transportation, and is employed for the transportation not only of men, but also of ammunition, food and other supplies to the battlefields. The advantages of supply points of this fuel in the northern Pacific cannot be overestimated, and the oil fields of Alaska may become of great moment in the international complications of the future.

It is not generally known that petroleum has been discovered in many parts of Alaska. In a paper read last year before the American Institute of Mining Engineers of New York, Dr. Alfred H. Brooks, who is at the head of the geological survey of Alaska, described four localities, all on the Pacific seacoast, where petroleum is seeping forth from the earth. There are probably other deposits of oil in the interior. E. de K. Leffingwell, who for years has been exploring the north coast, found a petroleum residue 300 miles north of the arctic circle, almost on the coast of the Arctic Ocean, and travelers speak of other possible oil territories.

I traveled the other day with a man who had been exploring in the Alaska range prior to the time when the coal beds were withdrawn from entry by the government. He had photographs of coal veins of enormous thickness. He claims that the coal is of a high grade, and says that there is a lake of petroleum sixty feet long and eighteen feet deep not far from the coal. He says the oil oozes out around the shores of the lake, and that he has taken some of it to the refineries at Cleveland, where it was assayed as equal to the oil of Pennsylvania. According to his story he had spent $4,000 or $5,000 in investigating these regions when the Pinchot-Ballinger excitement occurred, and he gave up all hope of doing anything with them. He says that the geological experts have passed within a few miles of the deposits, but so far no one but himself knows just where they are.

As to the oil along the Pacific coast, the Katalla fields are perhaps the best known. They lie on Controller Bay just below the Bering River coal field, and between that coal field and the sea. They are almost directly north of Kayak Island. They cover a belt thirty-five miles long and from four to eight miles in width as now defined by the seepages and springs of natural gas. They were beginning to drill there before the government locked up the oil fields and several claims had already been taken out. These claims the government could not control, and some work is now being done on them. In all twenty-six different holes have been drilled, and in ten of these more or less oil has been struck. Some of the wells have been producing from ten to twelve barrels per day, but the deepest well has been put down only sixteen hundred feet, and none has gone deep enough to actually test the field.

A little farther south along the coast is another oil region. This is known as the Yakataga field. It lies just beyond the Bering Glacier, and extends to the southeastward for a distance of perhaps twenty miles. The field is marked out by the oil seeping out of the ground. The southern edge of it is from a half mile to two miles from the ocean shore. The oil goes on to an unexplored and ice-covered region tributary to Icy Bay. Some is found oozing out of the ground near the Yahtse River, and a number of seepages are reported all the way from Yakataga to Yakutat Bay, a distance of several hundred miles.

THERE is another oil field only a short distance from Seward, on the west shore of Cook Inlet. The steamers to Anchorage pass near it. It is almost under the shadow of Mount Iliamna and not far from Iliamna Lake, one of the most beautiful bodies of fresh water in Alaska. This is the Iniskin oil field, so called because it lies on the shore of Iniskin Bay, which is a part of the western coast of the inlet.

The oil here is supposed to lie in a stratum of sandstone. It is seeping out of the ground. No drilling has been done there since 1904, and before that the field was only partially tested. One well was sunk to a depth of a thousand feet. It was producing gas and oil when the water rushed in and shut off the oil. A second well was abandoned at a depth of 150 feet and a third struck oil and gas at 170 feet. The Iniskin field is easily accessible to steamships, although the harbor is sometimes blocked by ice floes.

The fourth oil field on the Pacific seacoast is on the Alaska Peninsula, that great horn of land about 500 miles long which forms the southwesternmost point of the territory, ending in the Aleutian Islands. The oil has been found near Cold Bay, a distance perhaps of about 200 miles from the Kenai Peninsula, and just across the way from the Island of Kodiak. There are a number of oil seepages in that field, and two wells were drilled there before the conservation scheme stopped further exploration. The seepages are strong and in one place natural gas flows out of the ground. There a good harbor at Cold Bay which is en throughout the year. This oil fie is the nearest to Japan of those sc ar discovered.

THE fact that petroleum exist in Alaska is not new. The Cold ay field was known to the Russians a ar back as 1865, but no attempt was r de to investigate it; and thirteen y rs after we took possession of the terr ry oil was reported along the Pacific a- coast. It is now about twenty y rs since attention was drawn to the a- talla and Yakataga fields, and the st drilling at Yakataga was in 1901 A little later a survey was made f a pipe line from Controller Bay to at field.

Among the most interesting o il discoveries is the one near the A ic Ocean. It is in the shape of a m nd of solidified oil which rises high a ve the country about in the northern st part of our territory. It is so ne to the North Pole that Smith Bay, the r- bor hard by, is locked in ice f at least ten months of the year, an or this reason the field will not be m- mercially profitable. The moun is the residue of a petroleum fou in or spring. It is several hundred y ds in diameter, and it rises to a h ht of 150 feet above the level of the n- dra. It appears to be compose of petroleum containing an asphaltic se, in which are mixed vegetable m er and silt.

The discovery of these severa il fields, at such wide distances a rt, shows how little we know of Al a. The oil mound at Smith Bay is al st a thousand miles directly north o he point on the Alaska Peninsula v re the petroleum is oozing out at ld Bay. The oil seepages along the P fic coast extend at wide intervals a rt, over a distance, east and west, al st as great as that between New Yorl nd Chicago. Only about one-fifth of A ka has been carefully investigated b ur geologists, and there are probably er deposits of petroleum in the wil of the unexplored regions.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

A GRATEFUL Mother writes: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for my son. Some time ago I requested prayer for his conversion, and that he might quit the morphine and whisky habit. He now goes to church, and last Sunday joined the men's Bible class. His physician assures us that he is entirely rid of his bad habits. He has been more fortunate of late in securing work. I want the Prayer League to pray with me that he may soon have a steady position. I give God all the glory for this."

Mrs. O. D., from Little Rock, Ark., writes: "I want to thank God for answered prayer. I was crippled, had not been able to walk without a crutch for eighteen months, also lost use of one shoulder. I wrote asking prayers of the dear Prayer League in January. Now I can walk, and have regained use of my shoulder. I am so thankful. Please pray for my son that he may be relieved of the liquor habit, converted and return home. My heart aches, and I do need him so much."

Mrs. G. G. McC., of Ransom, Ill., writes: "I have been a bed-ridden invalid for the past twenty-one months. Twice in that time I have asked God for the recovery of mothers who were lying very close to death's door, and it seemed to me they could not be spared, one from three little girls, the other from one young girl of thirteen. God answered both of these prayers, and I am so thankful to him."

A North Carolina Friend writes: "Will say to the Prayer League that my eyes have improved so much that I have read two sermons recently and did enjoy them. Please pray that my husband may set his affections on things above instead of things on earth so we can live a happier life together."

A Believer in Prayer writes from Danville, Ill.: "This is to acknowledge answer to a request for prayer for the conversion of an absent son and his wife. I have received a very happy letter from him in a distant city, saying that he and his wife are both happy and converted. Please thank the dear Lord with me, and pray that they may be faithful and useful Christians. I also asked prayers for our church that God would bless us with a spiritual awakening, and today there were between forty and fifty new members (some of them among my own family) taken into the church. Please pray that the work of grace may continue. This is the third very gracious answer to prayer I have received within the year. Praise God."

Mrs. E. W. A., of West Woodstock, Vt., writes to acknowledge in the Prayer League column that God answered her prayer, and to ask the Prayer League readers to pray earnestly that her husband may be restored to perfect health. He is a great sufferer.

A reader from Sandusky, Ohio, writes: "I cannot refrain from acknowledging the wonders your prayers have effected in the widow's son for whom I requested prayers, who has overcome the liquor habit through God's blessing. I am thankful to tell you his mind is clear, and he is a good man."

A. writes from Newark, N. J.: "We asked the prayer of the League that a brother might be cured of the drink habit. God has graciously answered our prayers. Back into his eyes has come the light of other days. He has recently secured a promising position and is again happy in his home. We also ask the prayers of the League for a faithful teacher who is the victim of injustice and circumstances over which she has no control."

M. S. G. writes from Tuscaloosa, Ala.: "Several months ago prayer was asked for the restoration to health of a pastor who had a nervous breakdown. I wish to return thanks to God and to the Prayer League for the complete restoration to health and strength of this pastor."

A subscriber from Knoxville, Tenn., writes: "Some time ago I wrote asking prayers for the conversion of my husband. I thank God those prayers have been answered. Pray for me that I may have more faith. Pray also for the afflicted ones of my family. I need your earnest prayers."

A mother writes from Normal, Ill.: "I want to acknowledge that God has been very gracious to me. He has been answering my prayers in so many ways. I sent in a request for a husband to get work and that he might not be separated from his wife. I want to tell the League that this has come to pass, and he now receives good wages—and their home is a Christian home. Now I am in the deepest kind of trouble, and I feel I can not stand my grief. My son will have nothing to do with anything that is Christian whatever. It is breaking my heart. Will you please pray that God will convict and convert him."

E. S. writes from Leasburg, Mo.: "I want to thank God and the Prayer League for answer to prayer. I wrote for prayer to be able to sleep, also to be healed. God answered in giving me sleep. Please continue to pray that I may be so filled with the Holy Spirit and used for the glory of God as never before, and that I may be heal of heart trouble and dull hearing."

L. E. B., from Wichita, Kan., w es: "Twice before I have asked you t in me in prayer, and through God's odness and love mine and your pr ers have been answered, and I feel suc nfidence that I come again, asking y to pray earnestly for my husband, th his health may be restored, and that isease of long standing may be cured t is God's will. Please unite your pr ers with mine for him."

THEY make Motoring the Soaring Luxury of Motion it is primarily intended to be.

Here's why DIAMOND Tires are FULLY "Pneumatic!"

Built with as few layers of the best Fabric, as will carry the Car, and its Passenger load, FURTHEST.

Then Treaded with a fine-grained, non-ballasted, and Clingy "Velvet" Rubber, the ready stretch in which acts as a sort of lubricant between Road and Fabric,—reducing the Grind of Wear, and the disintegrating Heat of Friction, to a minimum.

This conservation of the Original Purpose in Pneumatic Tires gives you not only the longest distance for every Dollar you invest in DIAMOND Tires, but it also gives you—

1st—More net Motor-power from the same Motor.

2nd—More Miles, per gallon of Gasolene and Lubricant.

3rd—Less Wear and Tear on the Mechanism of your Car, and its Occupants.

4th—More of that smooth Road-work,—that absorption of Vibration,—that Wealthy Sensation of "riding on Air," which is the Heart and Soul and chief Satisfaction of intelligent Motoring.

Just test out a set of these "fair-listed," reasonably-priced, DIAMOND Tires, and see!

"Velvet" Rubber is also made into Diamond Bicycle Tires, and Diamond Truck Tires,—heavily increasing their Mileage and Resilience without increasing their Cost to you.

Sowing and Reaping

International Sunday School Lesson for June 11, 1916. G

The Law of the Spiritual Harvest

OUR study of the progress of the infant church is continued rather than interrupted by this illuminating chapter showing a characteristic bit of the teaching of the great apostle to the Gentiles. The secret of Paul's success as a moral energizer is shown here by his concise statement of the laws of the spiritual universe, absolutely convincing, and linked always with a distinctively Christian message.

"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." This is self-evident to the merest novice in farming. First decide upon the desired produce, and then sow accordingly. The wise scientific agriculturist studies his seed catalogues, and even lays tribute upon the resources of the government, to ensure the best seed-stocks in the world. But the faithful Creator and Sustainer of the physical order is also the God of the realm of the spirit. The harvest of life depends chiefly on the seed-sower. Cause and effect hold good in the moral sphere. "Sow a thought and reap an act, sow an act and reap a habit, sow a habit and reap a destiny." Otherwise God were mocked! Could men think evil and do good, sow tares and reap wheat, sow sin and gather eternal life, the will of God were mere caprice, and his providence a perverse chance. Therefore let us take heed what we sow. Oh, the careless, hasty, thoughtless words and deeds that make up so large a part of our sowing! And the purposeless, inadequate, unspiritual characters that cumber the ground of the Kingdom!

Sowing Unto the Flesh

PAUL shows us in Romans 7 the war between the lower and higher natures in his own soul. The carnal, the earthly, the natural man demands the gratifications and the course of conduct that satisfy the fleshly nature. He makes all manner of excuses to his own soul for his choice, but the harvest is "corruption." This is literally true in countless lives. Take for example the lament of licentious Byron as he reaped at the early age of thirty-six what he had sown:

> My days are in the yellow leaf;
> The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
> The worm, the canker, and the grief
> Are mine alone.

Not long ago a brewery printed in our leading papers a picture of victorious Alexander, with this caption: "Alexander the Great was a drinker of beer and he conquered the world at 32." But advocates of abstinence should "be not deceived"; for Alexander, drunkard and libertine, died of his excesses at thirty-three. God is not mocked—even by kings.

So men confuse the results of right and wrong elements of conduct constantly. Take the classic story of the profane farmer who sowed his corn cursing, cultivated it only on Sundays, defying God, and boasted that he secured one hundred bushels to the acre in the fall. A sage country editor remarked, "God doesn't close his accounts in September." Good seed-corn plus careful cultivation resulted in the one-hundred bushel yield, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. Profanity, ingratitude to God, boastful self-conceit will have their plenteous harvest, too. There was another man who had barnsful of corn and a miserable, vulgar, profane soul. The mildest term Jesus could find for him was, "Thou fool." (Luke 12 : 20.)

Always men have sought to ignore the law of the harvest, but they have only been self-deceived. "Let him sow his wild oats" is the foolish comment of many a worldly father as his son begins a course of youthful folly. Yet in his heart every sane man knows that "wild oats make no porridge," and the fruits of their sowing are heartache and loss at the last.

The conviction is now universa

The Art of Forbearance

TE true Christian is far from being prig. Jesus was never censorio toward the sinner. Particularly wa e charitable toward those who in hu n blindness sow to the flesh. "N ther do I condemn thee; go, and sin o more." Not condemnation, but red nption, was Paul's impulse, too. Th first two verses of our lesson prove his yalty to the Spirit of his Master. "G tleness" is the spirit essential to rec ming the lost. Do you not agree tha this is especially true of the victin of drink? The heroes of human sal ge in city missions or rough lumber car s have won their victories by the po r of love. Jerry McAuley, Frank Hi ns and all the rest came not to cen re, but to save. Does not the av ge church fail in this very partic r toward the boy or the girl who ma s a false step? Do not even fathe and mothers, wives and husbands, nee Paul's counsel to "gentleness" in toring one "overtaken by a fault," as e Revised Version margin gives his ought? I at least have seen it so. ' est thou also be tempted." Emerson ound in his own soul the possibili s of all crimes. Considering our ow hearts should make us humble and for aring to sinners. Besides, as our bel ed Stevenson says, "The man wh annot forgive any mortal thing is a een hand in life." Thomas à Ke is well reminds us in his great cha er on Galatians 6, "If thou canst not ake thyself such an one as thou wo lest, how canst thou expect to hav another in all things to thy liki ?" (Imitation of Christ, ch. 16.)

F the sake of a Christian family, wo erful forbearance is possible. In the me way, for loyalty to the kingdo of Christ we should learn considateness in the shortcomings of oth s, "forbearing in love, giving dili nce to keep the unity of the Spirit n bonds of peace" (Eph. 4 : 2).

R sponsibility is not weakened by suc a spirit of brotherliness. Each mu bear his own load as well. The kin ess which makes a Christian for aring does not make him weak an self-excusing. Jesus combined sup me tenderness to the erring with the ost exacting standards for himself As Tennyson puts it,

"Gentleness,
Wh when it weds with manhood makes a man."

Earing Your Own Burden

A Thought for Girls

"F R every man shall bear his own urden." That verse occurs in the ess for today, and it is one of the most sign ant verses in the Bible for a young girl o is just old enough to help herself and ust oung enough and inexperienced enough o l e help given her.

Another or a father or a big sister or brot r naturally wants to spare the young girl y worry. For that reason they try to kee rouble and fear and the rough side of life away from her. And yet a life without any difficulties or perplexities is almost sure to be an uninteresting life.

You have seen little pools of water, set in sunny corners of the world, with no outlet. That water fell from the sky as rain, pure and fresh, with unlimited possibilities for doing good to a dusty earth. But standing in the sun, with no motion it became stagnant and weed-filled.

A mind without trouble, a mind without even the little everyday worries, will in time become a stagnant mind from lack of motion. You girls, who have always had families to bear your burdens for you, must follow the verse of the lesson, and bear your own burdens. For a too tranquil life is very often a real source of harm to growth and character, and wideness of understanding. The bearing of burdens, no matter how small these burdens may be, will give a certain amount of confidence and courage and self-reliance that nothing else can give.

The Seed and the Fruit

EVERY boy who has gone through a corn field has, now and then, seen an ear of corn swollen and distorted by a black growth which, beginning at the top, had gradually tainted the whole ear until all of it was worthless. This was "rust" and it came from a tiny spore that infected the seed. The boy may have watched the farmer as he picked these ears and burned them. If he asked why (and what boy wouldn't?), he was told that these ears, if left on the stalks, would destroy all the corn about them; that the only way to keep the stand clean was to destroy the rusty corn.

There is a rust that destroys the lives of boys. It has many varieties, but the spore is always a little sin, a little folly, a harmless prank or a bad example. A young man in a Western bank took the money of the bank and ran away. They brought him back and packed him off to prison. As a boy he had cheated in all his games, he had fudged at marbles, he had played dirty football, and he had cribbed in his examinations. There was the spore—the embezzlement was the rust on the full ear. Another man beat his wife, ruined his home, lost a once prosperous business and brought up in the inebriate asylum. The spore was only "a glass now and then." The first rust appeared in his first spree, and it grew fast, until even his drinking friends would have none of him. A boy was found in his office with a bullet in his head. The spore was cigarettes. Boys, clean these spores out of your lives. Be clean, be square, and there will be no rust of sin upon your lives when full manhood is yours.

Mitchell MID-YEAR SIX
$1325 F.O.B. Racine

30-Year Service

John W. Bate, the efficiency engineer, has made the Mitchell a unique example of fine motor car engineering.

It is a study for experts in its lightness and simplicity. It has 440 parts which are made of drop forgings, or of tough stamped steel. There is hardly a casting in it.

Last season's Mitchell—with a similar chassis—was selected by 37 noted engineers as supreme in mechanical construction. All of these experts—men of nation-wide fame—selected the Mitchell for their personal car. Your Mitchell dealer has a list of them.

All known records for road endurance have been excelled by the Mitchell, we think. Six Mitchell cars have already averaged 164,372 miles each. That's more than 30 years of ordinary service. One has already covered 218,734 miles.

Engineers have often said that such road service could never be attained in a car.

26 Needed Extras

John W. Bate has also made this the model efficiency factory. All our new buildings—covering 45 acres—are designed for saving minutes. All our new machines—2092 of them—are designed to make parts for less than they are made elsewhere.

In the past six years his efficiency methods have cut our factory costs in two.

One result shows in the Mitchell price. No other car so large, so powerful, so fine is sold as low as this one.

Another result shows in 26 costly extras—things other cars omit. All are things you want and need. Some are most important. They all come in the Mitchell, without extra price, because of our factory savings.

A Study in Style

This Mid-Year Mitchell was completed after the New York Shows. It is based on a study of 257 Show models, including European styles.

The body design and equipment includes 73 new conceptions. It combines in one car all the best of the new ideas. So the Mitchell is now the most complete car on exhibit.

It has an extra-long body with beautiful lines. It has a 22-coat finish, French-finished upholstery, ten-inch spring in seats.

It has a light in the tonneau, a locked compartment, reversible headlights, a power tire pump.

It has the Bate Cantilever springs, which make it the easiest riding car in the world. It has an oversize ball-bearing steering gear, which makes it easiest to drive.

You will find this Mid-Year Mitchell the most interesting car on exhibit.

Unity

IT may have come to your notice that The Maxwell Motor Company does not base its entire advertising appeal upon the speed of a motor or the foreign lines of a body, or genuine leather upholstery, or the social distinction of its patrons—to the exclusion of every other feature of the Maxwell Car.

It is the Mâxwell policy that no essential unit of the Maxwell shall dominate Maxwell Character as embodied in the car and expressed in Maxwell advertising.

The motor, the chassis, the frame, the axles, the spring suspension, the electrical equipment — all the factors in Maxwell Character—have been designed and manufactured for a single fundamental purpose—to create a harmonious and efficient unity.

All the essential Maxwell parts are designed by us and manufactured by us to contribute their full share to the achievement of the maximum comfort, convenience, safety, service and economy.

There is no one important or conspicuous feature of the Maxwell; it is just the Maxwell Motor Car—designed, manufactured, sold and kept running by The Maxwell Motor Company.

The War in Europe

built. As it is, the occupation of this town by the Russians will put them in the rear of the Turkish armies operating from Bagdad east. The fifth army is operating in southern Persia and has reached the rampart of mountains which separate, at a distance of 110 miles from Bagdad, Persia and Mesopotamia. The apparent design of the Russians is to have these last two armies meet at Bagdad, in which event Turkey's hold on Mesopotamia would be greatly shaken.

The Russian front in Europe was lifeless all the week.

THE western front, except at Verdun, has not been at all animated. On the extreme western end of the line near Dixmude in Belgium there were some artillery duels between the German and Belgian artilleries.

On Saturday, May 13, the fighting around Verdun was less severe than on the two or three preceding days.

The French reported on Monday an intermittent bombardment of their lines the west front, and a small but successful tack by them on the German positions on th orth front on the heights of the Meuse, in hich they took some 200 yards of trench and captured some prisoners.

Tuesday there was considerable a vity around Verdun, particularly on the we ront thereof on Hill No. 304, where the G nans and French alternately attacked each ner's positions without any apparent chan resulting. Le Mort Homme Hill, to the rtheast of Hill No. 304, and Avocourt w l, to the southwest, were also heavily bom ded.

There was great activity by the ri artilleries on Wednesday on both the tern and northern fronts. This activit was fiercest around Avocourt and Hill 304, old storm centers, on the western front, between Douaumont and Vaux on the n ern.

During Wednesday night the Frenc captured a German redoubt on the north tern slope of Hill 304 and repulsed several man attacks on their positions south of Avo rt.

Falsifying War News

From the New York American, May 15, 1916.

SATURDAY'S cable dispatches reveal the fact that even General Joffre's popularity and great services have been so far forgotten that a formidable movement to deprive him of command is under way in France.

The reason for popular dissatisfaction is the steady progress of the German attacks at Verdun.

This news must be an astonishing surprise to Americans who read and believe the newspapers which have continually asserted the German attacks at Verdun to be failures. And here we have a curious example of unreasonableness in war times.

Thousands of people complain that newspapers lie to them, and the same people bitterly denounce as pro-this or pro-that the few newspapers which will not lie to them.

We have never been able to account for this silliness among grown men, though it certainly exists on all hands. We should think that every man would want to know facts, no matter how unpalatable they might be.

Take the war situation today, for example. The facts are that the German assaults upon Verdun have proceeded with clock-like regularity; that they have been carried on by methodical artillery pulverization of one point after another with a minimum of infantry assaults, and, of course, comparatively small losses of men; and that this slow, careful, engineering process has moved steadily forward until the vital railway lines behind Verdun, which are the real objective, are almost in the German grasp.

These are plain facts, stated without the slightest bias, as a newspaper should state them, and yet we do not doubt that, instead of being thanked for telling facts instead of lies, many persons, who ought to be ashamed of such childish behavior, will angrily denounce us as pro-German—probably as un-American.

As we say, it is hard to explai uch silliness in grown men. Yet we now that thousands of grown men ar hus afflicted.

For example, there are doubtles ome thousands of grown men who fi intense mental enjoyment in the verwhelming, irreparable, complet and finally crushing defeats which th New York —— editorially inflicts up the Crown Prince's armies at Verdun ery other day, at least.

Seriously, don't you think we nericans ought to be big enough and nsible enough to want our newspa s to tell facts and not childish fals o which are only told one day to eposed perforce on the next day?

APROPOS of the above, may w be quoted the following extract rom the very personal speech made by resident Wilson before the Washingt correspondents at the National Pres lub in Washington on May 16:

> I have several times taken the lib y of urging upon you, gentlemen, not to kno nor than the State Department knows bout foreign affairs. Some of you have sh n a singular range of omniscience, and tain things have been reported as underst d in Administrative circles which I never eard of until I read the newspapers. The Fight for a Trade Route

Russia is fighting for access to the Mediterranean. Sooner or later the clumsy, slow-moving bear will get his wish of centuries. England, through her fleet, the honeycombed heights of Gibraltar, and the sand ditch at Suez, will maintain control of the inland sea. If she also wins Mesopotamia, she will have a monopoly of the routes between East and West. Germany is fighting to win a commercial triumph over the sea route to the East. Her gigantic attempt threatens to disrupt England's possessions in Africa and Asia, and destroy the status quo.

Turkey produced 5,000,000 tons of wheat and barley in 1910. Its copper mines are among the richest in the world. Agriculture and mining, conducted in the most primitive manner at present, give great promise for the future. Germany is fighting for supervision over these resources.

Turkey is on the shortest line between the population centers of the world. Germany is fighting for this trade ute. The possession or control of T key by Germany interposes a wed of territory between England's posse ons and furnishes a perpetual threat disruption. Only in this way ca the soldiery of Germany oppose the n y of Great Britain. Germany is fighti for this strategic land, the possessi of which will maintain her on a pl of commercial equality with her aditional rival for the markets o the world.

As a granary, mine, and colony as a short cut to the East, and as a str egic position on the political and eco mi map of the world, Turkey is Gern y's last resort, unless defeat in Asia ives her to South America. The f of Kut-el-Amara is an important ev t in the winning of the emancipati of German world trade from the ty any of an overwhelming British vy Competition or monopoly? Neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable, but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

This is the first of a new series on investments which will be published in the Christian Herald, beginning with this number.

INDISCRIMINATION in the selection of investments for men and women is a mistake.

Men and women who have made no study of values of underlying elements of investments, of the difference between speculation, speculative investments and substantial investments, should not purchase any securities without obtaining advice from what they believe to be reliable sources.

There are some women who have made it their business to educate themselves along investment lines, and who know true values and can protect themselves against imposition by unscrupulous promoters and brokers. There are very few of these women, however—far fewer in number than may be found among the men.

Women should not speculate. Women should not put money into any security until all the facts regarding the security have been laid before them, and even then advice of a reliable banker or investment analyst should be obtained and adhered to.

Business men have a wider latitude than the wage-earners, and if their incomes will allow them to take chances with speculative investments they may act on their own knowledge and initiative in making selections.

Confounding investment with speculation is one of the mistakes commonly made. Every one who makes an investment, either man or woman, should make a study as far as possible of organizations or corporations, of real and imaginary assets, and of market possibilities in the event of liquidation.

Do not depend entirely on your banker, broker, or market adviser. Study and think for yourself as far as you are able to comprehend the problem of investing your money.

Primarily it may be said that there is nothing absolutely safe. The greatest element of safety in this country is in government bonds. Such issues are used almost exclusively by banks as a basis of circulation of their individual notes. The yield of government bonds is so small that they are not attractive these days, although many years ago many private investors held government bonds as permanent investments.

Next to government bonds come state bonds, which are issued by different states for public improvements. Following the line with state bonds are the state division bonds, such as county, city and town issues, all secured by the municipalities issuing them.

Public utility bonds, which may be given sufficient range to include railroad issues and telegraph and telephone bonds, are accepted as good investments. In recent years gas and electric, water and drainage have come into favor.

The word bond has been greatly abused, and does not carry any weight as an investment unless the bond has behind it assets of a convertible character that will insure dollar for dollar in the event of a forced sale. Bonds were first adopted in the United States by the railroads as a means of securing capital for building the earlier roads. The history of the railroads in the United States is dotted with foreclosures and losses amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. Only a few of the independent carriers of the United States are under the same name and form of operative management as when organized. Mergers and reorganizations have followed in rapid succession, while the list of obsolete securities of the railroads runs into the thousands.

As the railroads developed, more money was needed from time to time, and new issues of bonds were brought out following the first mortgage bond, which, of course, was a primary issue. There have come a score or more of different issues varying in value comparatively, and perplexing the ordinary purchaser of securities.

Answers to Financial Queries

MISS R. S. V., IOWA. International Harvester Company was incorporated in New Jersey in 1902. The charter was amended in 1913. The capital stock at par 100 consists of $4,000,000 authorized, all outstanding, of common stock, and $30,000,000 cumulative preferred 7 per cent. stock, all outstanding. The preferred cannot be retired. The preferred 7 per cent. dividend and 5 per cent. on the common are being paid.

The International Harvester Corporation was incorporated in New Jersey in 1913 and took over from the International Harvester Company of New Jersey all its foreign plants and business with the entire capital stock of foreign subsidiary companies except tractor shares. It also took over the plants in the United States manufacturing motor trucks, wagons, gas, kerosene engines, tractors, cream separators, implements, and so forth. The International Harvester Corporation issued to the International Harvester Company, in payment, all of its preferred stock, and all but thirty-six shares of its common stock.

REV. H. B. W., NORTH CAROLINA. Public Utilities stocks are coming into favor more each year. The better class of public utility issues represent a very good investment value, if the franchise is perpetual and the corporation attempts to please the public. The increase in earnings which comes with the growth of population of the various cities is a valuable factor.

O. R. C., TORONTO. As a rule gas and electric companies are more profitable than street railway or interurban roads. There is no set rule that may be applied to all public utilities. Each one must be analyzed separately, as there are good and bad investments, regardless of the fact that a public utility is a quasi municipal corporation. It is not always a safe investment.

MRS. D. W., ILLINOIS. Naturally the increasing price of silver metal will add to the earning capacity of the shipping silver mines, but this does not mean that shareholders will reap all the benefits of these increasing profits. It is a guess to make any forecast at this time of what the price of silver metal will be after the European war has ended.

A. B. W., BUFFALO. Nipissing is said to be the best silver mine in the Cobalt district, but it cannot be purchased as a permanent investment, as it must of necessity be very speculative. No one may safely predict the life of a mine, and a mine is never an investment. As a dividend is paid it is taken from the assets of the company, and is not the result of actual earnings. Yes, a copper mine comes nearer being a mining investment than a silver or gold mine.

G. T. C., MICHIGAN. American Light and Traction Company is one of the strongest of public utility organizations in this country. Conservatism has marked the course pursued by the officials, and stockholders have been given their full share of profits, which is unusual. The company pays a 10 per cent. cash and 10 per cent. stock dividend annually on the common, and has paid this same dividend for years. Naturally each year adds to the outstanding stock on which dividends must be paid, but the company's earnings have been so large that a large cash surplus has piled up each year, and the outlook is that the company can continue its cash and stock dividend policy for several years yet. Would not advise you to sell your stock if you want a speculation investment, as the yield to you is about 12 per cent. on your investment at the present selling price, which is around $370 a share.

Greater Value Than Anticipated

The Contest is really of more value than I anticipated. I wonder that such a grasp of Biblical knowledge can be given in two thousand verses as will be attained by those who have an opportunity to study the "Gems" thoroughly.—EDITH L. SWAIN, New Hampshire.

Leads to Diligent Search of the Scriptures

The Contest is great, and I am hoping that through it your subscriptions may be greatly increased, and that many persons who have heretofore been indifferent to the Holy Scriptures may become interested and led to search more diligently for the treasures therein. The Christian Herald is indispensable in our family.—MRS. JAY C. MOORE, Kansas.

Pleasure and Benefit

I must tell you how much I have enjoyed the study of your Bible pictures. It has been both a pleasure and benefit, and I trust it will not be long before you offer something again that will prove equally as entertaining and instructive.—MRS. H. S. SMITH, Georgia.

A Spiritual Help

I am very much interested in the pictures, and shall study them to the best of my ability, as a help to my spiritual life.—MRS. ALFRED H. TWADDELL, Pennsylvania.

Great Inspiration

Your Bible Picture Contest is of keen interest and great inspiration—it causes one to "search the Scriptures" and also makes one exercise judgment to select suitable verses to fit the pictures, and in other ways is a great benefit, even if one does not win a prize.—BLANCHE T. BOYD, Ontario.

Time Not Wasted

I have received the Contest Outfit and am at work hoping like many others to win a prize. If I win nothing I shall not consider the time wasted.—MRS. L. B. ELLIOTT, Arizona.

Most Profitable Pastime Ever Offered

I think the Contest is the most unique and interesting as well as profitable pastime ever offered to the reading public. No estimate can be put on the benefit in the way of Scriptural versatility and knowledge of the Bible that is possible to be obtained by this process of Bible research and perusal. One satisfactory feature about the whole matter is that you leave no stone unturned in dismissing all possible mystery and intricacy about the Contest by giving every possible explanation of every detail of the Contest and its solution. I am delighted with it. Again, you have thrown around the Contest every safeguard from advantages which might be taken of some contestants by others in the way of penmanship; this is praiseworthy and as it should be. I shall always be a subscriber to the Christian Herald. It is the best magazine I ever read. I will always commend it to the reading public.—T. W. J. TOBIAS, Tennessee.

Desires Pictures All the Year

When I entered the Bible Picture Contest I looked forward to a great deal of pleasure and benefit from the Bible study I should get, and I have not been disappointed. I am only sorry they are so nearly finished. I wish it were run through the full year. I am a bed-ridden invalid, and pass many hours with the pictures and my Bible and "Gems." I have cut out all the pictures and pasted them into a composition book, one on each page, and copied my answers into it so that I can keep them.—MRS. G. G. MCCANN, Illinois.

Food to the Soul

Am so interested in looking up the references in "Gems from the Bible." I do enjoy the pleasure of solving the pictures. It is a spiritual uplift to me. It is food to my soul every week. I can scarcely wait till the next Herald comes.—JANE I. WATERMAN, California.

Pastes the Pictures in the Bible

I intend to paste the pictures in my Bible, which will be a great help in making up short pictures and explanation talks in various kinds of meetings. The pictures are very suggestive and bring out many helps. I hear nothing but praise for your paper from all who take it. I wish you the greatest success.—D. H. WILLIAMS, Pennsylvania.

Eager to See the New Pictures

We are enjoying the Contest greatly, and it is laughable to see the eagerness to get hold of the paper when it comes each week, to see what the new pictures are. I am working at the pictures every spare minute I can get, because I like to. I feel sure that all this Bible searching among so many people must result in great good.—ADELAIDE TAYLOR, New York.

Trying to Interest Others

The Bible Contest and "Gems from the Bible" have been a source of great enjoyment to me. Have been trying to interest others.—MRS. C. D. LYNCH, New York.

Delightful Study

I am working for a prize, but shall never consider my time lost in working on the delightful study, though I never win anything.—EDITH HALL, Nebraska.

Results Far Beyond Conception

Never was I more interested, and anxious to get the paper each week, to see what next. And I believe this Contest will accomplish results far beyond our conception, and is much needed in all parts of our country.—MRS. JULIA E. J. EVANS, Pennsylvania.

Splendid to Inspire Bible Study

With many others, I am most intensely interested in the Bible Picture Contest. While of course I am anxious to obtain one of the generous rewards, still I do also consider the Contest a splendid thing to inspire real Bible study.—E. A. FISHER, New York.

Lasting Good to All

I think your Bible Picture Contest will do lasting good to all those who are taking part in it.—ALTA WILDER, Ohio.

Hopes for a Second Series

I thank you sincerely for the unique, fascinating pleasure and spiritual uplift I have received from the Bible Picture Contest, and hope a second series will be forthcoming. — MRS. JENNIE PETTIT, Illinois.

Every Woman, Every Man, Every Boy, Every Girl Is Able to Enjoy and Profit from the Bible Picture Contest

THESE letters are proof that all who have not entered the Bible Picture Contest are depriving themselves and those living with them of an unusually entertaining, instructive and profitable home pastime which satisfies old and young.

The Bible Picture Contest consists in fitting Bible Verses (compiled in "Gems from the Bible") to sixty pictures. Contestants select from the list the verses that fit the pictures best. Those excelling will be given the 419 cash rewards totaling $3,500.00.

The List of Verses, the Pictures and the Reply Book (in which contestants can conveniently write and submit answers), comprise the Contest Outfit. The Outfit is obtainable as part of one of the special offers given here. The Outfit is a convenience. Write for explanatory leaflet, telling also how to compete without expense.

Greatest Pleasure All Winter

The Contest has given me the greatest pleasure all the winter. Am sorry it is so soon to close. But we still will have the Herald, which I love dearly—count it next to my Bible.—MRS. D. H. VAN WAGNER, New York.

"Gems" a Treasure

I want to thank you for the Bible Picture Outfit. I am so glad to have it, and after the Contest, what a treasure I will have in "Gems from the Bible!" What a blessing the Christian Herald is!—M. C. VAIL, New York.

Great Profit

We, in our little family, are very interested in the Bible study, and I am sure that very many families will find great profit from your Picture Contest.—MRS. W. M. STAKELY, Alabama.

Great Help to the Children

We are very much interested in the Bible Contest. It has been a great help in Bible Study and also such a great help to myself and four children when we have a few minutes to spare together, as the children's father is now enlisted as a soldier of Canada in the present awful warfare.—A. M. KNOWLES, Canada.

Sorry the Contest Is Closing

I have found this study so interesting and instructive; am sorry it is drawing to a close.—ROSE PUTNEY, New York.

A Wonderful Work

The Bible Picture Contest is a wonderful work. I am finding more and more in God's Word for me as I seek.—MISS S. A. ZELLEY, Delaware.

Becoming Better Acquainted with Bible

I am very much interested in the Picture Contest and anxiously await the coming of the Christian Herald each week. I find that I am becoming better acquainted with my Bible, which is the Book of all books.—MRS. M. GANUNG, Connecticut.

Much Helped in Memory

I do consider this as a great work and a good thing for all of us. I am very much helped in my memory already. My age is seventy-seven years and four months, and I needed just this to benefit me in remembering dates and figures. I live alone, and oh, what company it has been for me these cold winter days and evenings! So thank you all who have been engaged in the starting of this great and profitable idea.—SARAH ROCHELLE, Michigan.

Memorized Many Bibl Verses

I wish to express my apprecia tion of the Bible Picture Contest I can hardly wait till my pape comes. I am a very busy house wife, with three small children t care for, but I find time to rea the little book "Gems from th Bible" once a week. I have al ready memorized a great man helpful Bible verses. I believ the picture contest is a direc answer to prayer for a bette understanding of the Bible; for good many years I have praye for this. And I wish to than you from the depths of my heart —MRS. MARY E. PEGAN, Ne Mexico.

Whole Family Interested

I think the Contest is a mos interesting and instructive recre ation and refreshes the memory I enjoy it very much. Our whol family is interested in hearing m talk of it.—MRS. E. C. BARRETT New York.

Gains Familiarity With Many Verses

I want to tell you of the interes your Contest has been to us When we are searching for th verses to fit pictures we come t other verses that otherwise migh not have impressed us as muc I think the pictures would be o much advantage in a Sunda school as they would arouse th child's interest in the Bible. Eve if I don't receive a reward enjoy the Contest.—RUBY L GALLEY, Texas.

Grand Way to Becom Acquainted With the Bible

I want to say that I enjoy you Bible Picture Contest, findin suitable verses for the pictures I find that it is indeed a gran way to become acquainted wit the Bible, and I find that I hav become a great deal more familia with it since I undertook thi work. I think this picture metho is fine and believe no other metho could have been used which coul have created a greater interes in the study of the Bible than thi I shall adopt this method mor fully in the teaching of m children.—MRS. BELS MICKEL SEN, North Dakota.

What It Means To On Little Girl

I just want to write a few line in regard to your Picture Contes and try and tell you how much i means to one girl at least. A friend lends me the Christia Herald, and in them I saw you Picture Contest and how to selec verses. It surely is helping me t be more familiar with the Bibl something which I needed. dare not even hope for any of th rewards, as there are so man more who know more about th verses of the Bible, and I am onl seventeen years old. But pleas let me say that if I get any of th larger ones it means I am going t school next year, and if not shall have to go to work, and hope and pray all the time that may be able to go to school. Ar not going to sign my name, a that wouldn't be fair, and yo will never know who this is.—JUST A LITTLE COUNTRY GIRL.

Interesting and Instructive

I want you to know how muc I enjoy the Bible Picture Contest and how I thank you for makin everything so clear and giving u such clear explanations and suc wide scope. It is very interestin and instructive, and caused us t refer to our Bible for more of th subject matter, where we fin link after link in the chain c adaptability to the verses i question. Yet these would neces sarily cause much confusion an doubt, had we not the "Gem from the Bible" which narrow the circumference.—MRS. H. B COLBERT, Virginia.

Bible Seems a Differ ent Book Now

I want to tell you before th Contest is over how much I hav enjoyed the Contest and wha good it has done me. The Bibl seems a different book to me an I shall always thank you for th help the Contest has been even i I do not win one of the prizes.—MRS. F. H. WORDEN, Montana.

What Statesmen of Two Nations Think of Sanatogen
"I am convinced from personal experience that Sanatogen enriches the nervous system ... increasing one's capacity for sustained work."
ROB F. BROUSSARD
U. S. Senator from Louisiana.)
"I have found Sanatogen very satisfactory—it is very valuable to compose the nerves in cases of long-sustained effort and exhaustion."
WM. C. ADAMSON, M.C.
"As a ... orative and tonic. Sanatogen has been of real benefit ... ne. It is deserving of all praise that has been bestowed upon it."
J. W. KERN
(U. S. Senator from Indiana.)
"Sanatogen is a pleasant nutriment for cases of impaired digestion. It strengthens without irritating."
WM. E. CHANDLER
(Former Sec'y of the Navy.)

IT is not surprising that so many statesmen, both here and in Europe, have found Sanatogen of such splendid aid in keeping body and nerves at a high point of efficiency.

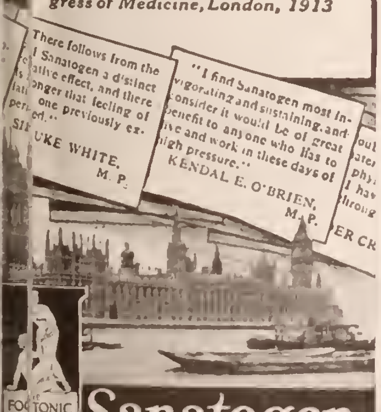
For the men who represent the nation are of the same human stock as the rest of us—their organisms are subject to the same raids by overwork and strain. And their experience with Sanatogen is simply the experience of countless men and women in other walks of life.

The endorsements here printed are typical of the many hundreds of letters received from prominent men and women—leaders of thought and action—who thus have voiced their sincere gratitude for Sanatogen's beneficent effects, just as more than 21,000 physicians—representing the medical profession of five continents—have approved its use.

In the face of such unparalleled endorsements can you fail to realize that Sanatogen stands ready to help you—whenever you are in need of its aid?

Sanatogen is sold by good druggists, everywhere, in sizes from $1.00 up.

Grond Prize, International Congress of Medicine, London, 1913



There follows from the ... Sanatogen a distinct ... ative effect, and there is no longer that feeling of ... one previously experienced."

About Scarcity of Milk in Germany

IT will be a relief to many of our readers whose feelings have been greatly and properly stirred by the agitation in behalf of milk-starved babies in Germany, to read another version of the matter by Mr. S. S. McClure, of New York, who, just before leaving Germany in the forepart of May, cabled to the Christian Herald as follows:

"All Germany is under food regimen, both in the city and county governments. There is a scarcity of milk, but it does not affect the babies nor the children. Every infant under one year old is assigned one quart of milk daily, or if the mother nurses the baby, the mother is given a quart. Children up to twelve have a pint to a pint and a half. Prospective mothers have a special allowance, and so have sickly children over twelve. What milk is left after filling these demands goes to the general public.

"The health of German infants, children and adults is better than previous to the war. The mortality rate among infants has decreased to a figure lower than ever in Germany history. The only possible danger that could arise to confront Germany would be bad crops this year. There is meagerness of food, but sufficient for health. If there is an average crop there will be no suffering. What I have said of Germany is equally true about Belgium, as to the babies. I have an article written by German officials explaining why the health of German people is better. Statistics from cities of 200,000 and over—twenty-six cities in all—show a decline in the birth-rate, but a greater decline in the death-rate of babies.

"I have visited many cities and talked with numerous officials and private citizens, observed school children, and gotten facts as to the weight and height of the children. In all the cities they are heavier and taller than in previous years. The aspect of the German people one meets on the trains, or on farms, or in the cities, is normal and calm, and there are no signs of grief or anxiety. Impressions of German people caused by conspiracies and German propaganda in America are wholly wrong. These people were never more worthy of respect and esteem. Subject only to failure in the year's crops, Germany and her allies are impregnable. It is this possibility of crop failure that makes the people demand the lifting of the blockade against foodstuffs."

IN the center of the Nile Delta lies Tanta, a city of 70,000, largely Moslem. In one of the poorest quarters of this city a Sunday school has been started for the children gathered from the streets. Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, Sunday school secretary for work among Moslems, describes a recent visit to this school: "The upper floor of a house has been rented, and we found every classroom full to overflowing with Mohammedan boys and girls. When this work first started, the children who came were of the poorest and could not read a line, but recently some very bright boys from the government schools have been attending. They are Moslems, and as Sunday is one of the regular school days, they came directly from their classes to this Sunday school. I saw a number of them with their Korans tightly clasped under their arms listening most intently to the lesson, which was from the book of Acts. Some of the questions they answered with quick intelligence, although they know almost nothing about the Bible as yet. Never in the history of the college has there been such a demand for the Bible. Moslem, Jew and Christian alike come, saying, 'Please send for a Bible for me.'"

ROCHESTER HI-SPEED TRAILERCAR IT TRACKS AND BACKS

Built like an Automobile

THE knowledge and experience of the ablest engineers in the automobile industry have been employed in the designing and building of the Rochester Trailercar.

The body on the Trailercar is hung low and mounted on specially designed springs which make it stick to the road at all speeds and prevent excessive jolting of the load.

With the Trailercar, you can deliver your merchandise safely and without jostling at any speed up to 30 miles an hour.

It is the only Trailercar that tracks perfectly and that can be backed in any desired direction.

The new draw bar for attaching Trailercar to the automobile is shock proof and prevents any possible injury from sudden starts or stops—it also makes it impossible to upset the Trailercar by a too short turn.

Write today for circular that illustrates and tells the complete story.

For the King

The Dish of the Palaces
Nearly All the World Over

"I was taken," he writes, "through the Emperor's kitchen, and what do you suppose? Why, there was Quaker Oats."

But in his own kitchen it wasn't.

It's a curious fact. We Americans import Scotch and Irish Oats to sell at fancy prices. But in the British Isles, where these oats grow, Quaker is the dominant brand.

And some of us take any oats that are offered, thinking oat flakes much alike.

But the connoisseurs of a hundred nations send here for their favorite oats.

. Here is one American product—one of the few—which has won the whole world's admiration. Don't you know that such a product must deserve supremacy?

Quaker Oats

The Supreme Morning Dainty

Oats, to have the finest flavor, must be northern grown.

But we go further. We take the choicest Northern oats and pick out the choicest third. That is, we discard two-thirds of the oats because they are underfed.

From the big, plump grains—just the cream of the oats—we make these luscious flakes. That's why this flavor has won the world.

Remember that. Without extra price—without extra effort—you can get Quaker Oats when you order. You can breakfast the same as kings. After that, a lesser oat dainty will hardly be served on your table.

10c and 25c per package
Except in Far West and South

A $2.50 Aluminum Cooker

Made to our order, extra large and heavy, to cook Quaker Oats in the ideal way. Send us five trademarks—the picture of the Quaker—cut from the fronts of five Quaker Oats packages. Send $1 with them, and this double cooker will be sent by parcel post. This offer applies to the United States and Canada.

Merry Moments

ORIGINAL anecdotes, full of real fun, will be welcomed for this column, and only these will be paid for.

WHAT IF THEY ALL DID IT? Fresh from his vacation, the minister faced a large congregation, who were very kind in their praise of his sermon. The next Sunday a larger congregation came and listened with growing concern to the same address as before. The next Sunday he preached the sermon again. The officers of the church, after much consulting together, asked him why. The minister replied, "Why, yes, it was the same sermon. The first Sunday you told me how fine it was, and how it was just what you needed. I watched you all week, and you lived just as before, so I preached it again. All the following week I watched, and you lived just the same; so, remembering that you all had said it was just what you needed, I preached it once more. Unless there is some sign of improvement, don't you think I'd better plan to repeat it again?"

FREE MEDICAL ADVICE. "Doctor, my brother stepped in a hole and wrenched his knee and now he limps. What would you do in a case like that?" "I'm afraid I should limp, too!"

COLORED GLASSES. Jimmie was playing with the boy next door. Nurse went to get him, but he refused to come; so he was carried, screaming, away. The family and neighbors commented:

Sister—"He's a contrary little rogue."

Father—"He's a stubborn little rascal."

Neighbors—"He's a little savage."

Mother—"How strong-willed Jimmie is!"
—The Advance.

BUSINESS SYSTEM.—Despite his illiteracy, Mose Belt, a leading citizen of an Alabama town, has gathered quite a competency from his whitewashing and kalsomining trade.

Recently, during the course of some business with a notary, the latter produced a document, saying:

"Sign your name here, Mose."

"Look heah," said Mose, with offended dignity, "I doesn't sign mah name, suh. I'se a business man, suh, an' has no time for dem trifling details. I always dictates mah name, suh."—Western Christian Advocate.

TRICKERY EVIDENT.—"Pa," inquired a seven-year-old seeker after the truth, "is it true that school-teachers get paid?"

"Certainly it is," said the father.

"Well, then," said the youth indignantly, "that ain't right. Why should the teachers get paid when us kids do all the work?"—Ladies' Home Journal.

A NEW IDEA OF ECONOMY.—"Tommy," said the fond mother, "isn't it rather an extravagance to eat both butter and jam on your bread at the same time?"

"No, mamma, it's economy," Tommy answered. "The same piece of bread does for both."

Food Values in Mexico

REV. W. E. VANDERBILT, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, in a letter from Vera Cruz, makes some interesting observations on present-day social and economic conditions in Mexico. He writes: "In Vera Cruz the cargadores know that their money was not of very much real value and so their prices have gone soaring to the skies. It cost me $15 (Mex.) to get my trunk carried from the side of the ship to the custom house and from there to the Terminal Hotel. On the following morning the charges for taking it from my room to the baggage room in the same building for checking it were $10. In Yucatan I had to pay as high as $18 (Mex.) per day for food, and that of a very inferior quality.

"As I see it at the present time the real problem of the Carranza government is not that of the pacification of the country, but the adjustment of economic conditions. The value of the paper money has deteriorated so much that prices have gone up beyond the reach of the common people to supply their daily needs. In Zitacuaro corn is $60 per carga (a carga is 5.15 bushels); beans $130 per carga; wheat $110 per carga; flour $12 per arroba (an arroba is 25 lbs.); lard $4 per kilo; sugar $4 per kilo; meat (mostly bone and sinews) $2 per kilo; manta $4 per meter (used to cost 18 cents); blankets nothing less than $40; milk 75 cents per liter. The daily wage of the common laborer is from 50 to 75 cents per day, and I know of men who are working for about 37 and 40 cents. It is impossible for such to feed their families, much less to clothe them.

"There was a good crop of corn last year, so that the present supply is fully sufficient to meet the needs of the people; but the price is so out of proportion to the daily wage that I foresee a great deal of suffering. Since beginning this letter a week ago, the price of meat has increased twenty-five per cent. White thread, No. 50, costs $1.50 per spool; matches that used to cost one cent per box now sell for 40 cents. The 10 cent cans of baking-powder are priced at $6, the one pound cans at $24, and the 10 cent boxes of rolled oats at $8."

SCATTERED REMNANTS

Sheltered beneath her mother, the baby watched, fascinated A tiny vase rocked gently with each thundering crash of the big guns.

In the corner flickering red things danced gaily.

Slowly they spread to the ceiling.

Finally the room glared, roaring.

Driven from her burning home into the chaos outside, the mother fled wildly, clutching her baby.

At the corner she paused—staggered—then sank, a crumpled heap.

A tiny pink spot, like a rosebud, slowly widened until her kerchief dripped redly.

The baby crawled out, chuckling gleefully as the houses jumped into the air.

Finally tiring, she cuddled against her mother's body, and slept.

Speaking of his delight in his wife's housekeeping, Robert Louis Stevenson said:
"My joy is to see her hanging clothes on the line in a high wind".

THERE is something almost jolly in a swinging line of snow-white clothes dancing in the sun. Their very appearance is such good compensation for the work of washing that every woman should be interested in whatever will help make them whiter and clearer than ever.

Ivory Soap will do this. It not only cleanses clothes thoroughly but because of its own whiteness and quality it does not discolor fabrics nor leave streaks and spots which defy the most thorough rinsing.

After washing with Ivory Soap, clothes are as clear and white as soap and water can make them. Sun and wind do not have to bleach out the effect of the washing itself. They merely give the finishing touch to garments that one can be proud of the moment they go on the line.

The Methodist General Conference

By WILLARD PRICE

ace: Saratoga Springs, New York.
me: Evening twilight.
ene: Before a newspaper store on the local Broadway. Scores of preachers are passing. Across from the store is a lovely park, all lawns and fountains and flowers, shadowy now in the growing darkness. In the center of the park is a brightly illuminated building. Many preachers are pouring into this building and many more are flocking through the doors of a larger hall farther down Broadway.
haracters: Proprietor of the newspaper store. And myself, just arrived from New York.

The Preachers Capture Saratoga

"HAVE you a local newspaper?" I ask.

One is handed to me. The front page is plaster with the benign faces of Methodist bishops. Th proprietor of the store is watching me and there is peculiar quirk in his eye.

'New thing for this town," he says, "to have our pape filled up with preachers!"

'What did it used to be filled with?"

'Horse racers and gamblers," he replies.

H is full of the story of old Saratoga and here are a fe of the things he tells me:

Te building over there in the park is called the Caso. It was formerly one of the greatest gambling res s in the land. Wealthy, spendthrift Americans wh came up to attend the races occupied their evening in making and unmaking fortunes at the spin of t roulette wheel in the Casino.

Te usual gambling limits were taken off and players mig bid as high as they pleased. Many a man in the istory of the Casino entered the gaming room wit hundreds of thousands of dollars, and came out pen less. Many a tragedy was enacted there.

Al then Canfield, the owner, himself met tragedy. Th state legislated against gambling and the Casino, or e "Saratoga Club," went out of business. The ill-g wealth of Canfield began to dwindle. Last yea he decided to cancel an expensive life insurance pol and he went to New York for this purpose. On s way to the insurance office he fell through a hol n the street into the subway and was killed. Ho fortunate for his family that the hole was this sid f the insurance office rather than the other side!

T city of Saratoga bought the Casino and conver l the gounds into a public park.

"nd now, if you look sharp," said the newspaper sell "you can see a big white sign across the front of t building. It is too dark to read it but it says 'Geral Conference Missionary Exposition and Soc Center.'

"es, sir, I'll be hanged if the Methodists haven't occ ied the old gambling den, and in the main room, wh champagne used to run like water, they have raised up a lighted cross and hold a missionary meeting every afternoon! It is enough to make Canfield turn in his grave!

"And up Broadway there, a Committee on Evangelism is holding evangelistic meetings in the old Congress Hall ballroom. Down Broadway, just beyond the park, that big building where the people are going in is Convention Hall. It holds five thousand and the Methodists are filling it every day. That Hall has been the scene of some of the most corrupt political deals that have ever been put across in the history of this State. Both the Republican and Democratic conventions used to be held there, and it seemed that everywhere you looked around this town you would see a big boss holding some little whelp of a delegate by the lapel of his coat and shaking him into line.

Dr. Mary Stone of China (laughing) and Mrs. Hahr of Korea

"Times have changed," he concluded with a smile and retreated into his store.

Some Things Methodism Will Not Stand For

HE was right. Times had changed. From all over the United States and from more than twenty foreign countries came the delegates to Saratoga to attend the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The General Conference is the ruling body of Methodism. Once every four years it meets and its legislations affect the three million members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This year it spent the entire month of May in its sessions and took actions which will deeply affect the future of Methodism and of religion in general.

Desecration of the Sabbath, divorce, Mormonism, and the saloon were attacked by the Board of Bishops in their Episcopal Address which was endorsed by the Conference on the second day.

"The desecration of the day in our time," say the Bishops, "is very largely an invasion from continental Europe, taken advantage of by the avarice of great corporations and irresponsible lovers of excessive and harmful pleasure. The desecration is mostly by persons who care nothing for law of any kind. 'In the presence of the danger to the Sabbath which this state of things engenders, the Church can do nothing less than bear ringing testimony and hold unflinchingly to the teaching that all worldly business and labor, except the works of necessity and mercy, are forbidden on that day.' It can do more. It can insist on enforcement of such laws as will preserve and protect Christian rest and Christian worship."

It is interesting to note in passing that a few days later a telegram was received from the Druggists' National Sunday Rest Committee, congratulating the Conference on its stand and assuring the Church of their cooperation.

On the subject of divorce the Conference noted that of late divorce has increased three times as fast as the population, and urged that all the pastors of the Church exert themselves against this evil.

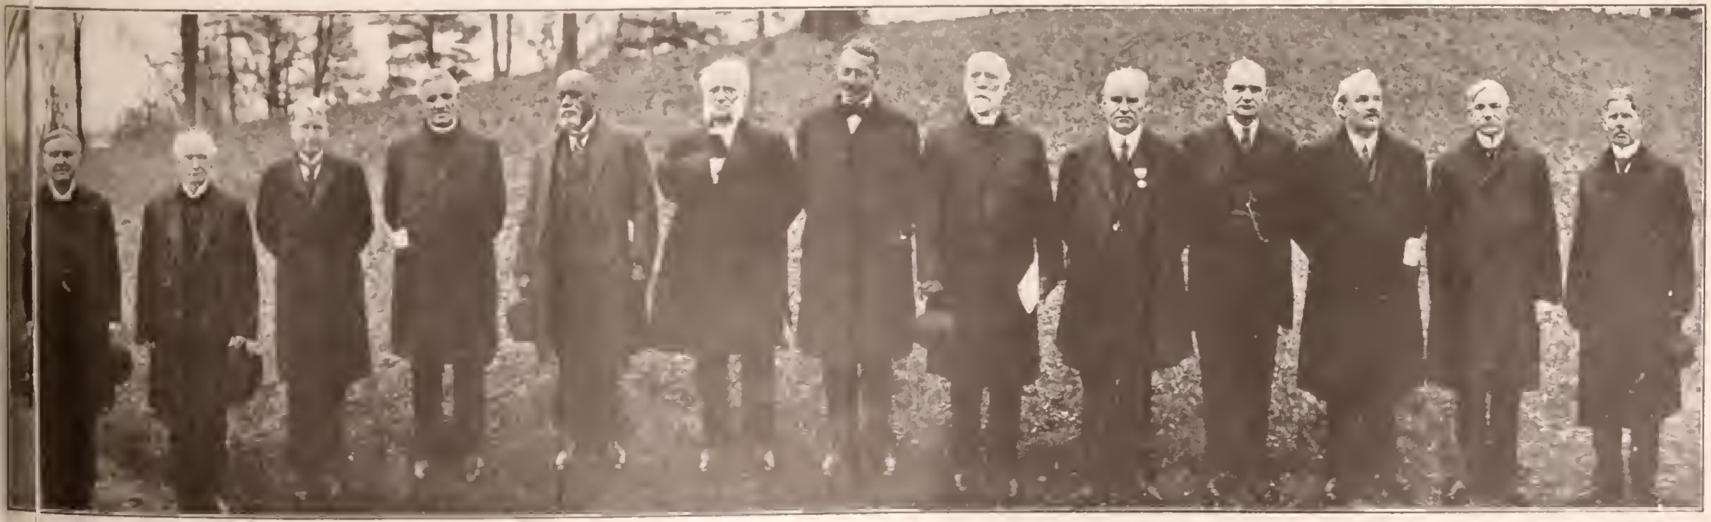
Speaking eloquently of the fight for prohibition the Bishops say:

> With vodka absolutely prohibited in Russia and absinthe in France, accompanied by such remarkable decreases in crime and such improvement in economic conditions as give promise of permanent prohibition; with unusual progress in official condemnation and legal restriction of the traffic in Germany, in the United Kingdom and in other European nations; with nineteen states and large sections of the remaining states under prohibition; with a recognition of the injury of intoxicants to industrial and economic efficiency; with a growing conviction of all great men that it can never be legalized without sin; and even with the supporters of the traffic in a panic over the handwriting on the wall, we call upon our members to press forward with good hope for the submission of a national constitutional amendment and the speedy outlawry of this execrable traffic.

Wanted—Clean Moving Pictures

A RESOLUTION was sent to Governor Whitman, urging that he sign the bill already passed by both houses which provides for a more adequate censorship of moving pictures. (The Governor has since vetoed the bill.) The resolution was as follows:

> Whereas, "The Christian-Wheeler Moving Picture Censorship Bill" has passed both houses of the New York State legislature and is in the hands of Governor Whitman for his signature, and



MISSIONARY BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

Summerfield Baldwin of Baltimore, age 83, the only layman delegate who was in the conference of 1872 where laymen were first admitted

Whereas, This Bill provides for a more effective censorship for the protection of the morals of our citizens, especially of the children and young people who are increasingly exposed to the detrimental influence of films protraying vice and crime, and

Whereas, This General Conference, the legislative body of the Methodist Episcopal Church, represents in a peculiar sense the conscience of thousands of citizens in this State and millions in the Nation, therefore be it

Resolved, That we do hereby petition His Excellency, the Governor of the State of New York, to sign this bill and we hereby instruct the Secretary of the General Conference to send a copy to Governor Whitman to assure him of our keen anxiety and conviction.

Child Labor Law Supported

CHILD labor was denounced in no uncertain terms by the Conference through the Episcopal Address. The denunciation took a constructive turn when the support of the Conference was offered to the pending National Child Labor Bill as follows:

> While protesting earnestly against all state laws permitting the forms of industrial labor by children that dwarf young bodies and darken young minds, we likewise record ourselves as heartily favoring the Keating-Owen Bill which has recently passed by a large vote the National House of Representatives. We trust that this bill may soon be passed by the Senate and may receive the approval of our President that the children oi the Republic may have just and gracious protection.

Union Labor Is Recognized

FOR the first time in history the Church has adopted a definitely favorable attitude toward the labor Unions. There was a great deal of feverish debate before this action was taken. Certain delegates were thoroughly opposed to organized abor, and one, heated to the point of explosion, said that "murder, robbery, theft, every crime in the catalogue" had been committed by members of the class of workers with which the Methodist Episcopal Church was asked to align itself. The conservatives were strong but the radicals were stronger and prevailed.

"The world of toil is becoming a thinking world," cried Harry Ward, Secretary of the Methodist Federation of Social Service, "and woe be to the Church and Christianity if it permits that thinking world of toilers to drift away. Woe to it if it does not give to that group the strong, practical help and sympathy that will enable it to lead the world of labor into the Kingdom of God. This is a small thing in this report, brethren, and we shall go far beyond this before many years have passed. For eight years I have striven to get this thing enforced in the Methodist Episcopal Church because I believed it was the first practical step in Christianizing the industrial world. For that reason I ask you to adopt it."

One reason why the fight was so warm over the proposal was that Methodism itself in its publishing houses and other institutions employs thousands of workers who would be affected by such a ruling. The Methodist Book Concern, which publishes millions of pages of books and papers annually, was particularly opposed to any action which would force them to show preference to union labor.

Finally the word "preference" was struck out of the proposal, but even at that, the report as passed was by far the strongest utterance the Church has ever made on the subject of labor.

Here is the significant part of the memorial as adopted:

> It would naturally follow that since the Church is itself a large employer of labor directly and indirectly, it must itself in some way realize collective bargaining; either in one of the two forms which are now developed or in some other yet to be devised.
> A sound principle to govern the Church as an employer would appear to be that in recognition of the price being paid by organized labor to improve conditions of industry, on account of its general contribution to the community welfare, every possible endeavor should be made to work with it in so far as its methods are just, and in so far as the rights of unorganized men are not infringed upon.

The Little Doctor-Lady of China

A DISTINGUISHED visitor to the Conference from the other side of the world was Dr. Mary Stone, the famous little Chinese physician who was the first girl in Central China to grow to womanhood with unbound feet. Dr. Stone was educated in the mission schools of China and in the medical school of the University of Michigan. She has developed a splendid hospital in Kiukiang, China, and reached last year through her work a total of about twenty-four thousand persons.

She is the most charming and delightful personality one could meet. She has a spontaneous, girlish way, and her laughter is so ready and so hearty that she says she has been nicknamed "Minnehaha." Nevertheless her tears come quickly when she speaks of "my poor patients" and tells China's need of Christianity.

Another visitor, better known in America, was the Hon. Charles S. Whitman, Governor of the State of New York.

"It is close contact with humanity," said Governor Whitman, "that I would urge upon the ministers of all denominations today. I was introduced the other day as a man who was entirely at home in two interesting places: the one within the walls of the Criminal Court and the other within the walls of the Christian Church.

"I was graduated from a Christian parsonage into the practice of the criminal law. And I sometimes think if the criminal courts and the church could get a little nearer together it would be better for both of them.

It is close contact, if I may repeat, with humanity that I would urge upon the ministers of all denominations. We do not want them on the side lines, we want them in the game. Mere wistfulness is without potency. The preacher who refuses to take account of the world and its problems is sacrificing, it seems to me, an opportunity which comes to few men in this day and in this age."

There was great excitement in the Conference over the election of bishops. Seven new bishops were elected. (A more detailed story of the election follows this article.)

Great Churches Clasp Hands

THE climax of the Conference—perhaps th nost stirring moment of any General Confer e— occurred on May 16 when the entire delegatio rose en masse to adopt the report favoring the union the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Met dist Episcopal Church, South. The binding toget r of these two great branches of Methodism would sult in a Church of more than six million members. his final triumph comes after years of tactful n tiation, during which one difference after anoth has been smoothed out of the way. The Met dist Episcopal Church South at its General Conf nce two years ago passed an action favoring unior and it was this proposal that was accepted, with ery slight modifications, at Saratoga.

Those who were present will never forget th ene when Bishop Cranston of the Northern Chur and Bishop Hendrix of the Southern Church clasped nds. There was weeping and shouting and th the Doxology rose tremendously to the rafters.

When silence was restor the presiding Bishop said: "As any as are opposed to the adop n of the report stand and be cou ed."

Not a man stood. The nti- ment for union was unani us.

"This has been the su eme moment of my life since t day God called me to be His o for eternity," said Bishop Cra on.

"For fifty years and re." said Bishop Hendrix, "sin my student days in Middl own. Connecticut, in the dark s of the war, has this been m constant prayer that they mi all be one. Brethren, I pra that the whole Methodist body the world may more and m see eye to eye and that my ve able brother and myself may to jointly stand together ov the united General Conferen of United Methodism in Ame a."

Only minor details rem to be adjusted and it is hope that two years h e a special sessi of the Northern Gen- eral Conferen may meet in the ame city with th Gen- eral Confere o the Southern rch and there c um- mate the pla for union.

b Dr. S. Earl Taylor, on behalf of the Board of Feign Missions and the Woman's Foreign Missiary Society, made a profound impression. He sted that, "the horrors, the desolations of this war he driven the people back upon God."

n all lands there is a turning toward Christianity th like of which has not been known before in the hory of missions. Apparently the war has had a sring effect and the comfort of religion is being sght throughout the world.

n evangelistic campaign is sweeping Japan, and D Taylor stated the opportunities are so great that th Protestant missionaries in Japan have united in he call for four hundred and seventy-four new nsionaries. In the Philippines "five thousand new nnbers were added during the past year and the nsionaries report over a thousand converts each ding the months of 1915." In China, in the Hinga Conference alone, one hundred and eleven new clrches have been organized during the last two yrs. In India, all the churches and mission schools a full and there is a waiting list of one hundred and fi thousand persons who have had to be refused btism for the present because there are not preachers a teachers enough to care for them.

Burdened with the responsibilities imposed by tl considerations set forth in this paper," said Dr. Tlor, in concluding his report, "we express our smn conviction that the present situation on the fign mission field is without parallel in all the Cistian centuries and that the Church must either orr its foreign missionary forces to cease seed sing and harvesting or make more adequate provon. * * * In view of the conditions herein s forth we respectfully request that the General Cference take such action as it may deem wise wreby the whole situation may be carefully consired and a report made as to what steps the Mthodist Episcopal Church should take more fully tneet its world-wide obligations."

he Conference immediately went into a session o prayer, and then the report was referred to the Cnmittee on Foreign Missions that they might dw up a plan adequate to meet the world emergency. ater the following resolution for a World Program w adopted:

> hereas, We have heard with profound concern the statemt of world conditions made by the Board of Foreign Msions, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society and the Bops having Episcopal Supervision in foreign fields; and
> hereas, There seems to be a providence in the fact that tl critical period of the world's history comes at a time when o material prosperity is becoming a temptation to us; and > hereas, We can only remain Christian when we manifest tlsacrificial spirit illustrated in the life of our Lord:
> esolved, That the Committee on Foreign Missions to which tl paper was referred be requested to report a world program wh will in some adequate fashion meet this world need.
> esolved, Second, that they be requested to consider what chges if any of organization and method are necessary to a ise the Church to an appreciation of this situation and a ne adequate response.

MANY of the greatest statesmen of the Church are now, as this is being written, meeting toher in committee and laying far-reaching plans which will put the shoulders of Methodism—perhaps of the United Methodism—under the most gigantic world task ever undertaken by a Christian Church. Of these plans I shall be able to tell more definitely next week.

The Newly Elected Bishops

By Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D.

ONE person out of every fourteen, one Christian out of every five, one Protestant out of every four, in the United States is a member of the Methodist Church. More than one half of that number belong to the Methodist Episcopal branch of that denomination, the quadrennial session of whose General Conference, held in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., for a month, has just closed. The General Conference, besides being the law-making body, also selects the leading officers to administer that law. It reaches the climax of interest and enthusiasm in the election of Bishops.

In the first ballots taken there were between one and two hundred candidates voted for and as a two-thirds majority is required for a choice, no selection was made till the seventh ballot when Rev. Herbert Welch, D.D., President of the Ohio Wesleyan University, was elected. Leaders in church and state do not usually have their birth in cities or homes of financial ease. Dr. Welch was born in New York City, November 2, 1862, the son of Peter A. Welch, a prosperous business man of that city. Dr. Welch graduated from the Brooklyn Collegiate and Polytechnic Institute in 1882, from Wesleyan University in 1887, and from the Drew Theological Seminary in 1890. He began his work as pastor in Bedford Station, Westchester Co., New York Conference. The year 1903 he spent abroad studying at Oxford University. In 1905 he was elected President of the Ohio Wesleyan University to succeed Dr. Bashford who had just been elected to the episcopacy, which position he has filled until now. As a preacher Dr. Welch succeeded in the best pulpits of his denomination, and in every regard he made his mark as a college president.

HOW often the secretaryship of the Board of Education of the church has been the stepping stone to the episcopacy. Eight years ago when Dr. William F. Anderson was made bishop, Dr. Thomas Nicholson became his successor, and at the conference just held was elected to the episcopacy. He was born in Woodburn province of Ontario, Jan. 27, 1862. He graduated at the Normal School in Toronto in 1883, and then came over the line to begin his ministry in Michigan. Ambitious for a liberal education, he went to Evanston where he was graduated from the Garrett Biblical Institute in 1892, and from the North Western University in 1893. Bishop Nicholson is a clear thinker, a forcible speaker, and his breadth of vision and consecration to the highest ideals have given to the educational interests of the church under his leadership singular success.

THE next one elected bishop was Rev. Dr. Adna Wright Leonard, pastor of the great Church at Seattle. He is the son of the late Dr. Adna B. Leonard who was one of the most splendid figures in modern American Methodism. The son was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, Nov. 2, 1875. He completed his course in Pennyton Seminary in 1895, graduated from the New York University in 1899, and from Drew Theological seminary in 1901. He became the pastor of the Methodist Church in Rome, Italy, remaining for one year and returning to join his father's conference at Cincinnati. His six years' successful pastorate in Seattle, one of the most important appointments of the denomination, attracted the attention of the delegates in search of a leader. As President of the Anti-Saloon League of Washington, he was a champion leader in the fight which resulted in prohibition for that state.

DR. MATTHEW SIMPSON HUGHES was elected bishop on the tenth ballot. He was born in West Union, Va., on Feb. 2, 1863. He was graduated from the West Virginia University and has been a member of the three last General Conferences. He was the fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church South two years ago, and his address had much to do in hastening the plan of the union of the two branches of Methodism. He has had a long line of what are termed first-class churches. The conference went wild with enthusiasm when Bishop Edwin Holt Hughes was sent down to escort his brother Matthew Simpson Hughes to be introduced to the conference.

DR. WILLIAM F. OLDHAM, who was next elected to the episcopacy, has had an unusual history in modern American Methodism. He was born in Bangolore, India, December 15, 1854. Hall Caine calls the heroine of his novel, The Christian, "Glory Quayle," after the family of W. A. Quayle who was made a Methodist bishop in 1908, and Kipling in his "Bridge Builders" refers to Bishop Oldham's father as a young engineer. The bishop-elect was educated at Allegheny College and at the Boston University. Eight years ago he was elected missionary bishop for Southern Asia. Four years ago he caused a surprise by resigning his office, and standing for election for one of the Corresponding Secretaryships of the Missionary Society, which was considered a place of less honor, but he answered what he considered the call of duty and was elected one of the Secretaries. No such a thing had ever happened in the history of the denomination. The other unusual thing happened when the General Conference just closed, elected him again to the episcopacy with a higher honor and larger responsibility. Bishop Oldham wields a facile pen, is the author of several books on missions, is one of the most eloquent pulpit and platform orators in the country, is an authority on missions in the Orient.

DR. CHARLES BAYARD MITCHELL, who was next chosen, was born August 27, 1857, in Pittsburgh, in a parsonage. He was graduated at

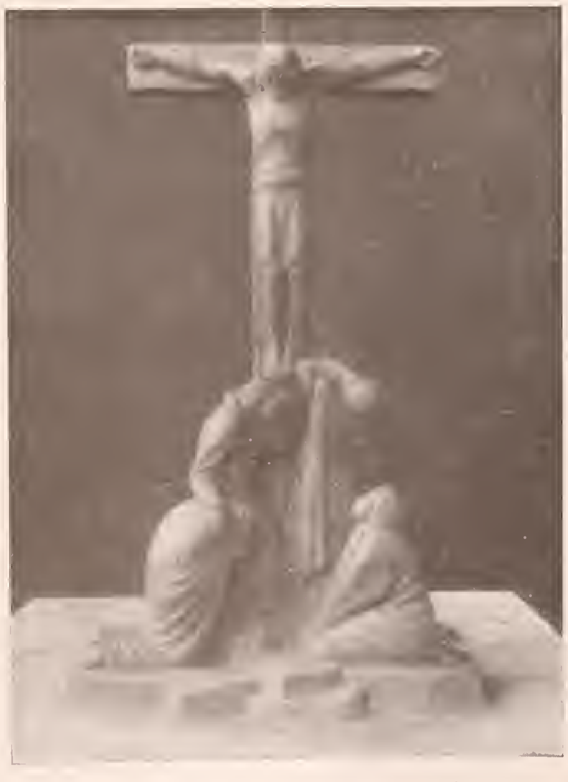
Upon the Cross



"The Crucifixion," by Arnold Ronnebeck

EVERYONE who has visited the countries at war has told of the reawakening religious feeling among soldiers and stay-athnes, but very little has been said aut the religious impulse and the Fopean artists. Many of them in the battle-line hve shared the emotion and the prayers of their crades who, before the war, were men of the mrketplace or of the laboratory. Many of those who hve had to stay at home have admitted that their wk seems suddenly trivial, of little importance in a w-ridden world, and they have laid aside pen or bsh to turn to the sterner work of helping their cntry in work for the wounded or for the families o he soldiers.

he writing that has been done in the trenches, and t sketches that have been made there and sent back a for the most part free of the most modern influences wch have so long held sway in study and studio. A l all through there is a distinct sense of the life al death conflict in the world and in the soul. What t feeling will be after the war is over no one can tell, l it seems likely that it will manifest itself in work wch is frankly religious. For there will not be an aist alive over there who will not be mourning the ls of a comrade, and each will have the sense that hmust do work worthy of that dead friend.

BUT there is one man, a sculptor, who, before he went out to battle, had made his change of mood mnifest in his work. It was just before Easter, 1914, iBerlin, and he was at work upon some municipal dorations for the new bridges on a boulevard. He ws known for the skill with which he could use the n art ideas called "cubistic" and "futurist" without lng a quality which made them understandable the people at large. He had just come back to his hne after years spent in Paris where he had gained rognition. His work had nothing to do with the sl but seemed, at least, to be concerned with the gmetry of external form. He found his inspiration ihe very modern ideas of efficiency and speed—in all those qualities believed to belong to a world well past all danger of crude warfare.

And what is even more interesting, in view of his moment of religious impulse, he was greatly interested in the Oriental. His dream was to go to India to see the architecture of the Buddhist temples. His studio had in it all the ancient Buddhist books, and photographs of its monuments.

SUDDENLY, in the midst of his work, Arnold Ronnebeck was overwhelmed by a strange and unaccountable feeling of sadness. It was not like a mood, but rather like a deep shadow cast over him and his work. He was under contract to do the work, but he could not keep at it. Finally he yielded to what was for him a mysterious impulse, and let his feelings have their way with him. No one was more astonished than he when he had finished, roughly but with simple power, a figure of the crucified Christ and the mourning women.

He could not explain it. He wrote to a friend as though ashamed of having left his chosen field for what his friends would consider an old-fashioned and conventional subject: "I felt I had to do it. I could find no other symbol to express my sense of tragedy. But as soon as it was done I felt relief, and I am working again."

His friends did not like the figure and said so. They shook their heads at Arnold Ronnebeck's moment of madness, and wondered if it might not affect his whole work.

Undoubtedly it has done so. In the following August he was on his way to the front as were so many thousands of the flower of Europe.

Did the war fling the shadow of the cross over the sensitive soul of the artist, and was his mood born of the inner knowledge that there was to be another crucifixion, and that again throughout the world, there would be women mourning at the foot of the cross upon which Humanity was bleeding?

WORK OF CONGRESS. The Army Bill as agreed upon in conference, was passed by the Senate on May 17, and approved by the House May 20. On May 18, the Naval Appropriation Bill was reported to the House. It calls for five battle cruisers of 35 knots an hour, each to cost about $25,500,000; 20 submarines, including three 800-ton sea-going, at a total cost of about $20,000,000; 4 scout cruisers to cost about $5,500,000 each; ten destroyers, one hospital ship, one fuel ship, and one ammunition ship. The total amount will reach about $240,000,000, about $90,000,000 more than last year's budget. On the 23rd, the Military Defense Bill, said to have the backing of the President, was introduced into the House by Representative Hay; it provides for a council of executive information consisting of the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, Agriculture, Commerce and Labor, and seven civilians nominated by them and appointed by the President. It will be the duty of this council to investigate the location of railroads and highways with reference to strategic necessities and to coordinate the needs of the government and the industries of the country. The Administration's Shipping Bill was passed by the House on May 20. The River and Harbor Bill has been having hard sledding in the Senate throughout the week. On May 18, Secretary McAdoo submitted to the House, estimates of expenditures and probable sources of income which showed that it will be necessary to provide about $150,000,000 in new revenue. On May 23, the House passed the Porto Rican Bill which gives Porto Rico entire control of all its internal revenue, and provides for citizenship under certain property and educational qualifications. An amendment providing for woman suffrage was eliminated from the bill before its passage.

ON THE EVE OF THE CONVENTIONS. With the renomination of President Wilson at St. Louis on the 14th a foregone conclusion, the eyes of the country are naturally turned to the meeting in Chicago on June 7 of the Republican and Progressive conventions, for it is generally believed that these two conventions will unite to nominate the most formidable contender, with Mr. Wilson, for the presidential honor. A few weeks ago there were a number of booms, but most of these seem to be evaporating and disintegratng, uncovering a movement which aims at the nomination of Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes. Justice Hughes has refused to be considered a candidate but has not stated definitely that he would refuse the nomination. Various elements antagonistic to Colonel Roosevelt in 1912 were reported a week before the convention as uniting in his support. Roosevelt finally put himself on record as a candidate for the nomination. That part of the Republican party commonly referred to as the "Old Guard" is said to be furthering the Hughes movement in an endeavor to head off the nomination of Roosevelt, and there is also evidence of a popular desire for Mr. Hughes' nomination. It is even possible that the Hughes and Roosevelt strengths may be so evenly matched that a compromise candidate will be chosen. The possibility of a separate Progressive nomination will hang over the Republican gathering until the choice is made.

ANTI INJUNCTION LAW VOID. On May 19 the Massachusetts Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the law which prohibited judges from issuing an injunction in labor disputes unless it was apparent that irreparable damage would be done. The court held that the courts must be open to all on the same terms, and that no obstacles can be thrown in the way of some which are not interposed in the paths of others.

THE EARTH TREMBLES. On May 19 serious earthquakes shook central Italy. On the 22nd, severe earthquake shocks were felt in Greece, and slight shocks were felt at Honolulu, these apparently being connected with renewed activity of the volcano Mauna Loa which began an eruption on May 20. The volcano Kilauea is also unusually active.

PROFIT SHARING PAYS. A report of the Educational Department of the Ford Motor Company covering the time in which the profit-sharing plan has been in effect, shows that in two years bank deposits of employees have increased $4,972,518, the average individual deposit increasing from $62.12 to $204. Two years ago employees were purchasing homes worth $3,282,331, now they are purchasing homes worth $21,787,193. Life insurance has increased from $2,471,663 carried by 2572, to $14,822,916 carried by 17,116 employees. Of 29,000 employees, only 19 claimed no religious faith.

RELIEF FOR THE SUGAR MARKET. Reports from Porto Rico show that this year's crop will be in excess of 463,000 tons, an increase of approximately 118,000 tons.

BUILT IN THE SHADOW OF BUNKER HILL. On May 18, five thousand people cheered the launching of the naval supply ship, Bridge, the first really large steel ship ever constructed at the Charlestown Navy Yard. The Bridge is of 8500 tons displacement and will have twin screws. Her length is 423 feet, beam 55 feet, draft 21 feet. Her estimated speed is fourteen knots. She will cost about $1,250,000.

WILL PROSPERITY LAST? In an effort to allay a certain nervousness which is abroad in the land regarding the possible effect upon our industries of a sudden declaration of peace, Harris, Winthrop & Co., of Boston, recently mailed a questionnaire to leading business men of the country. To the question "Will your business be directly affected by peace in Europe?" 28 answered yes, 750, no; 225 rep ed unemployment in their section, 32 reported none. To the question wh er labor is satisfied with wages now b ng paid, 887 answered yes, 598, no. As to the possibility of important st es during the summer, 309 answered es. 900, no. To the question as to wh er business men were willing to have he tariff question taken out of pol s, 1416 answered yes, 65, no. As to he influence of the increased wages or x travagance, 761 reported laborer as saving while 520 believed that incre ed earnings led to greater extravaga e. To the question "Has the war in Eu pe increased the sense of civic resp sibility and American nationalism an ng the people of your section?" 1310 nswered yes, 185, no. The answer to these questions are interpreted as indicating that business men feel at prosperity is here to stay.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indèpendance Belge

PEACE rumors have increased during the past week. One suggestive event was an attack on Sir Edward Grey by Mr. P sonby, the Liberal member for s ling, in the House of Commons. M Ponsonby said among other things th the peace of Europe would depend o he capacity of statesmen for survey ir the great problems in a broad spirit. T insularity which had characterized B ish diplomacy in the past constitu d the real danger. The government m t realize that the war had reached a d llock.

he war would never end. Mr. P sonby continued, if Great Britain w ed until Sir Edward and Dr. von B hmann-Hollweg (the German Imp al Chancellor) agreed as to who was re onsible for the war. Had Germany re sed to restore Belgium, evacuate F ace and Serbia, and form an indep dent Poland? Had she refused to a e to form an international council t maintain European peace? If she h refused these things the country o ht to be told, Mr. Ponsonby d ared.

We ought not to allow diplomatic et uette to stand in the way of taking t lead definitely, openly and boldly to b g the nations back to sanity and pe e," Mr. Ponsonby concluded.

ames Ramsay MacDonald, Labor m ber from Leicester, supported Mr. P sonby. He declared that peace was a litical and not a military problem. a that it was the duty of the governm t to state the terms on which it was p pared to conclude a peace. The si ificance of all this lies in the open di ussion of peace in the Commons, a t g which would not have been p ible six months ago.

nd along this same line may be m tioned reports which have reached A rica that the German press is disc ing the subject with a freedom and o nness and almost definiteness that w ld not have been permitted by the g ernment six months ago. This is re rded as significant of deliberate in ntion to prepare the public mind f peace proposals.

ossibly the future historian of this w , who will see clearly where we today s through a glass darkly, will date the b nning of the end of this war from t visit of Mr. Asquith to the Vatican s e weeks ago. At all events the chain o events since that visit, viz.: the a ivity of the King of Spain, the very n ceable cooling off in vindictiveness m ifested in the recent public utter- a es of those in authority in Germany a Great Britain, the request of the P e to the President of the United S es to avoid a conflict with Germany o he ground that such a conflict would m erially postpone peace, and other e nts, all seem to point very strongly t he probability that the first outlines o n understanding are being reached; t gh perhaps no negotiations of any ki between the interested parties h e yet been initiated.

et the writer knows one foreign s i-diplomat of a neutral European p er who is in this country on a special m sion for his government who is sure t such direct negotiations have been in ated and that by the middle or end o ext month the fruit thereof will be m ifest. Well, we shall see.

ut there can be little doubt that all t nations involved are heartily tired o ar, the frightful losses in lives, the si ply unbelievable expenditure of m ey, etc., etc., being the principal m ing causes. Even in the past week M Asquith had to ask Parliament for a ther billion and a half dollars to c y on the war till August, and G many began preparations for the is e at the end of June, of another two b on dollar loan.

he condition of Ireland seems to be in roving on the surface, at least, but a ar as we know there has been no a eement reached among those interes d as to the form to be given to the fu re government of that country. Mr. Asquith has returned to London, and Lloyd George, minister of munitions, has been selected to negotiate between the divided Irishmen on this subject. Sir Roger Casement is to be tried June 26, along with Daniel J. Bailey, a former British soldier, Casement's accomplice.

The British are showing some activity in Mesopotamia, southeast of Kut-el-Amara, where Gen. Lake's forces are reported to have made an advance on the right bank of the Tigris, carrying the Djuailam redoubt.

CAIRO, Egypt, was bombarded the middle of the week by some Turkish aeroplanes. This is the first time that the Turks have made an attack on this city, and the fact of this attack, coupled with developments around El Arish the other day, indicate that there is much more either actually going on or in course of preparation in the vicinity of the Suez canal, than we are advised of.

In Asia Minor, the western wing of the Russian army operating on the line southward from Trebizond to Erzerum, has made little or no new progress, the defense of the Turks stiffening, and at some points the Russians have been compelled to give ground.

The Austrian offensive on the south Tyrol front against the Italians is making rapid progress, and it is becoming apparent that its objective is the Italian fortresses of Vicenza and Padua, the capture of which strongholds would cut off the bulk of the Italian army operating farther to the east along the line of the Triest defenses.

In the south Tyrol, in the ten days which this offensive has lasted, the Italians have been driven from the positions in Austrian territory which had taken them a year to acquire, and back over their own border, whither the Austrians have followed them, so that the fighting on this front is now going on entirely on Italian territory today (May 25).

The Austrian tactics greatly resemble those used against the Russians in Galicia this time last year, enormous concentration of artillery, and the Italians seem as little able to withstand the rain of projectiles as were the Russians. At the moment the Austrians are beseiging the fortified areas of Asiero and Asiago at the head of the Italian railway which leads south to Vicenza, after having captured the outer defenses of these areas at Monte Verena and Campodolon, south of the Surgana Valley.

FROM comparative tranquility on Friday and Saturday of last week, the battle around Verdun became more active and more ferocious the early part of this week than at any time heretofore. On Friday, May 19, the Germans claimed that on the western front they repulsed three attacks by the French on Hill No. 304, and inflicted severe losses on the attacking forces when they retreated through the open country around Esnes to the south of that hill. The French, however, claimed to have captured a German position on the northeast slope of Hill 304, and a trench on Hill 287, and to have stopped a German attack on their own positions on the hill and at Avocourt.

On Saturday, the Germans captured trenches on both sides of the Hancourt-Esnes road, to the southwest of Hill No. 304, taking a hundred or so prisoners with these trenches. The French reported that Avocourt, Hill No. 304 and Le Mort Homme were all very violently bombarded the whole day. On the northern front little happened, and the eastern was calm.

On Sunday around Verdun the fighting on the western front was intense a good portion of the day. The Germans made an attack on the French positions on the southern and southwestern slopes of Le Mort Homme hill and carried them. This attack was launched after artillery preparation from the German positions on Hill 304 to the west, and the result makes the German hold on the northern, western and part of the southern slopes of Le Mort Homme apparently secure. Eight cannon, a number of machine guns and 1250 French troops were captured, in addition to the ground won.

A German attack on the southeastern slopes of Hill No. 304 was not so successful, as, after entering the French first line trenches, the Germans were driven back by the French counter-attack.

There was very hot fighting on Monday on the western front. The Germans stormed the French positions on the eastern spurs of Hill No. 304 and held most of them against the French counter-attacks, though a portion were retaken by the French. South of Hill No. 287 the French recaptured a small work taken by the Germans on May 18.

On Tuesday the Germans claimed to have captured a French blockhouse in this region and to have repulsed French attacks east of Hill 304 and (this location is to be remarked), on the southern slope of Dead Man's Hill.

On the west front the Germans repulsed a strong French attack on the southwestern slopes of Le Mort Homme, and farther east stormed and captured the village of Cumieres; 300 French were made prisoners.

On Monday the French took the offensive north of Verdun and penetrated German positions over a front of a mile and a quarter, from Thiaumont Farm to Fort de Douaumont, entering the fort. Most of this ground was held until Tuesday on which day German counter attacks in force began to press the French back. In the morning of Thursday the Germans regained some of the ground lost the day before between Thiaumont farm and Fort Douaumont, capturing 500 prisoners. In the afternoon the French state that the Germans recaptured Fort Douaumont after repeated assaults thereon, though they, the French, hold the immediate approaches thereof. Immediately after an attempt was made to flank the French positions in Caillette wood, a little south of Fort Douaumont, which the French defeated. By Saturday, after four days of fighting with bayonet and hand grenade from shell hole to shell hole, in what amounted to the most bloody and hotly contested pitched battle on the Western Front during the war, the Germans had won back most of the ground taken by the French on Monday and had also again taken the Haudremont quarries recaptured by the French during the week before, making progress as well on the slopes south of Fort de Douaumont.

On Thursday the French abandoned the Dead Man's Hill, one of the key positions on the western front, but they still held the hill under their artillery fire so that the Germans were unable to occupy it. On the north front the battle raged with even greater violence than before, if possible. The French admit that they were driven out of their trenches to the east of Haudremont, but claim that the battle is not yet finished in this vicinity, and that, therefore, this loss may be retrieved. In this Haudremont fighting the Germans reported taking about 800 prisoners. The losses during the week by both sides were very large, which is natural since the fighting was the most desperate and continuous seen so far in this war.

Washington Protests Mail Seizure

AT last the administration at Washington has dispatched the long-heralded note to the British and French governments on the question of interference with American mail. The note is most interesting reading and in itself contains a fairly complete summary of the offenses against which our government now protests. The text of the note as published in the press of May 27 is given below.

Excellency:

I HAVE the honor to acknowledge receipt of your Excellency's note of April 3 last, transmitting a memorandum dated Feb. 15, 1916, and communicated in substance to the American Ambassador in London on Feb. 28, in which are stated the contentions of the British and French Governments in regard to the right to detain and examine parcel and letter mails en route by sea between the United States and Europe.

After a discussion of the use of the mails for the transmission of parcels and of the limitations to be placed on "inviolable mail," the joint memorandum of Feb. 15 closes with the following assertions:

"1. That from the standpoint of their right of visitation and eventual arrest and seizure, merchandise shipped in post parcels need not and shall not be treated otherwise than merchandise shipped in any other manner.

"2. That the inviolability of postal correspondence stipulated by the eleventh convention of The Hague of 1907 does not in any way affect the right of the Allied Governments to visit and, if occasion arise, arrest and seize merchandise hidden in the wrappers, envelopes or letters contained in the mail bags.

"3. That true to their engagements and respectful of genuine 'correspondence' the Allied Governments will continue, for the present, to refrain on the high seas from seizing and confiscating such correspondence, letters, or dispatches, and will insure their speediest possible transmission as soon as the sincerity of their character shall have been ascertained."

In reply the Government of the United States desires to state that it does not consider that the Postal Union Convention of 1906 necessarily applies to the interferences by the British and French Governments with the oversea transportation of mails of which the Government of the United States complains. Furthermore, the Allied Powers appear to have overlooked the admission of the Government of the United States that post parcels may be treated as merchandise subject to the exercise of belligerent rights as recognized by international law. But the Government of the United States does not admit that such parcels are subject to the "exercise of the rights of police supervision, visitation, and eventual seizure which belongs to belligerents as to all cargoes on the high seas," as asserted in the joint note under acknowledgment.

It is noted with satisfaction that the British and French Governments do not claim, and, in the opinion of this Government, properly do not claim, that their so-called "blockade" measures are sufficient grounds upon which to base a right to interfere with all classes of mail matter in transit to or from the Central Powers. On the contrary, their contention appears to be that, as "genuine correspondence" is under conventional stipulation "inviolable,' mail matter of other classes is subject to detention and examination. While the Government of the United States agrees that "genuine correspondence" mail is inviolable, it does not admit that belligerents may search other private sea-borne mails for any other purpose than to discover whether they contain articles of enemy ownership carried on belligerent vessels or articles of contraband transmitted under sealed covers as letter mail, though they may intercept at sea all mails coming out of and going into ports of the enemy's coasts which are effectively blockaded. The Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and France, however, appear to be in substantial agreement as to principle. The method of applying the principle is the chief cause of difference.

Though giving assurances that they consider "genuine correspondence" to be "inviolable," and that they will, "true to their engagements," refrain "on the high seas" from seizing and confiscating such correspondence, the Allied Governments proceed to deprive neutral governments of the benefits of these assurances by seizing and confiscating mail from vessels in port instead of at sea. They compel neutral ships without just cause to enter their own ports, or they induce shipping lines, through some form of duress, to send their mail ships via British ports, or they detain all vesels merely calling at British ports, thus acquiring by force or unjustifiable means an illegal jurisdiction. Acting upon this enforced jurisdiction, the authorities remove all mail, genuine correspondence as well as post parcels, take them to London, where every piece, even though of neutral origin and destination, is opened and critically examined to determine the "sincerity of their character," in accordance with the interpretation given that undefined phrase by the British and French censors. Finally the expurgated remainder is forwarded, frequently after irreparable delay, to its destination. Ships are detained en route to or from the United States or to and from other neutral countries, and mails are held and delayed for several days, and, in some cases, for weeks and even months, even though not routed to ports of North Europe via British ports. This has been the procedure which has been practised since the announcement of Feb. 15, 1916. To some extent the same practice was followed before that date, calling forth the

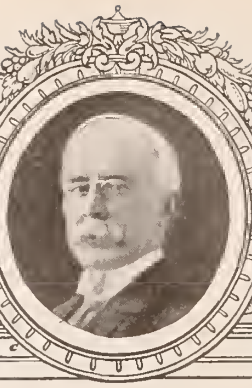
THE BEQUEST OF PEACE



A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—John 14:27. "My peace I give unto you."

WE have acquired a rather perverted conception of peace. Our common applications of the word are suggestive of the perversion. We go out into the country lanes when the winds are asleep, when the birds are silent, when the leaves are still, when the cattle are reclining in the meadows, and the quietude of the scene prompts us to exclaim, "How peaceful!"

We climb the mountain slope. We see the roaring, tempestuous torrent as it plunges madly down the rocky gorge. We wander into the silences of the heights, into deep, hidden recesses, where the mountain tarn makes its lonely home. The stillness remains unbroken, save by the occasional scream of a startled bird, or the bleating of a straying sheep, or a bark from a distant homestead. "How peaceful!"

We walk through the streets of a great city in the early hours of a Sabbath morn. The business houses are closed. No hurrying messengers make the air palpitate with their haste. The perspiring traffic is at rest. The crowd is absent. The echoing step of the policeman is interpreter of the intensity of the silence. "How peaceful!"

We go into the chamber of death. We see the stilled form, the unchanging features, the absence of all movement, of all struggle, even of a breathing or a sigh, and we whisper to one another, "How peaceful!" And so peace has become associated with the unstirring, the quietness of sleep, the silence of stagnancy, the stillness of death.

Now, when we turn to the Scriptures, quite another conception of peace prevails. There is nothing significant of the motionless and the stagnant. Its characteristics are not those of the death-chamber or the depopulated city. The life of peace is not slept out by the stillness-haunted tarn, or the windless meadows. In the Scriptures peace is associated with movement, and with movement abounding! "Then had thy peace been like a river!" The figure stands out in vivid contrast to the modern symbols. "Peace like a river!" not like a tarn, or a death chamber, or a still and breathless morn, but "like a river!"

JUST look into the wealthy figure. The life where peace prevails shall be like a river. Then life shall not be fragmentary, broken up into many, and sometimes hostile, sections. A river is not a thing of varied and incongruous parts; it is a liquid and consistent whole. Life like a river—not divided against itself; it shall be all of a kind, entire, congruous and consistent. The life where peace prevails shall be "like a river." Then life shall be progressive, moving on to greater fulness, possessing larger carrying powers, marked by more spacious sympathies, more comprehensive breadth. The life where peace prevails shall be "like a river." Then life shall be musical, not still and quiet as the grave, but breaking into song, lisping thankfulness in its infancy, and with the diapason of its prime moving to the sound of great and triumphant oratorios of praise. Peace like a river—consistent, progressive and musical.

Can we get the common denominator of these three descriptive terms? I think we can. The common or primary element is to be found in the element of harmony. Harmony is the determiner of consistency, the king of progress, the secret of music. Let us then drop the Scripture figure, and attempt a definition which the figure seems to enshrine. Peace is essentially concord. Peace is not quietness. It is the noisily incongruous subdued into harmonious partnership. It is not stillness. It is the hostile and the sectional leashed into harmonious movement.

NOW, the Bible has two charges to make against common human life. It first of all proclaims that life is fundamentally discordant. An appalling wrench has occurred. A violent severance has been made. The unredeemed man is out of harmony with God. An amazing discord prevails. He is not in tune with the Infinite. The statement is not made as the expression of a mere theological doctrine. It is not a dogmatic statement, thrown, for purposes of discussion, into the arena of party controversy. It is not a harmless proposition; it is a searching accusation. I am not asked to discuss it; I am asked to answer it as a personal charge.

Am I in tune with the Infinite? Am I in concord with the Divine? The charge is this—that alienation has occurred. "Your sins have separated between you and your God," cries the old prophet! You are out of touch with God! The word of the prophet is abundantly confirmed throughout the entire Book. You may recall one or more of the many figures under which the relationship is expressed. It is expressed under the analogy of husband and wife; and sin has created an appalling divorce. It is expressed under the similitude of the head and the members; and sin has produced rebellion among the members, a kind of spiritual St. Vitus' dance, the limb moving on its own initiative beyond the controlling sovereignty of the head. It is expressed under the symbol of the vine and the branches; and sin has created a rotting and impoverishing disruption. Under all these figures, the Bible expresses itself concerning the unregenerate man. A gracious relationship has been broken. A purposed harmony has been destroyed. Life is disjointed in the secret place. There is no p ce. Life is fundamentally discordant.

The Traveler

By Edwin L. Sabin

Pleasure beckoned with airy towers
And gardens basking in sunny hours;
On to the gold, and out of the gray--
But Duty called, and I turned away.

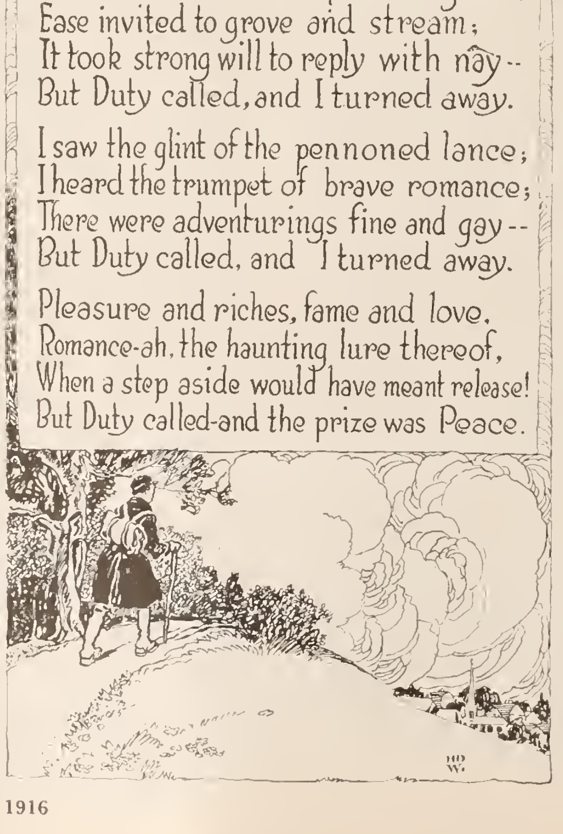
Fame extended its starry crown;
Should I pause for an instant and lift it down?
Ready the laurel and ready the bay--
But Duty called, and I turned away.

Yon, in the bypath, Love roamed fair;
Smiles and a welcome awaited there.
Ah, how the heart of me longed to stray!—
But Duty called and I turned away.

Riches lured with their sparkle and gleam,
Ease invited to grove and stream;
It took strong will to reply with nay--
But Duty called, and I turned away.

I saw the glint of the pennoned lance;
I heard the trumpet of brave romance;
There were adventurings fine and gay--
But Duty called, and I turned away.

Pleasure and riches, fame and love,
Romance-ah, the haunting lure thereof,
When a step aside would have meant release!
But Duty called-and the prize was Peace.



Now, following upon this primary charge, the ble makes another statement, again keeping close t the experience of the common man. It affirms tha because of this mortal and mortifying discordanc the movements of life are attended with painful fri on. Is this merely theoretical and academic, or is severely practical and experimental? The state ent is this—that discordance in the life creates pa ful friction in the exercise. What is our personal a ver to the charge? We are familiar with the fact hat in the physical life the exercise of a limb is fra ght with agonizing pain when the limb is out of nt. Bone grinds upon bone—the bones which were urposed to move in smoothest and friendliest symp hy.

IT is not otherwise in the realms of the spirit. V en the soul is out of union with God, when the is discordance in the most intimate places in the fe, then all moral and spiritual exercises become a pa ful and exhausting strain. Why, we have command ed this very word "grind" to express hard, dry, juic ss drudgery. The word is not out of place in the h ier reaches of the spirit. When there is discord ce, disjointure in the soul, the claims of the highe ife are a wearying and painful grind. "Thou hast en weary of me!" Duty is a grind! The exercis of worship are a grind! Movement is reluctant. Pr er is sluggish. Generosity goes with cheerless ss. The soul is in discord, and duty is a hardship.

Well, now, these are the collateral statements de by the Word of God. Unregenerate life is a dis rd and a friction. The restoration of peace means he annihilation of both. It means the end of the dis rd and the cessation of the friction. The aliena on between man and God is abolished, and the separ ed bride and bridegroom are remarried in a strong nd gracious wedlock. Now, mark this: the first to r ke the move toward reunion is the wronged husb d. It was not our aspiration, but God's love, that b an our eternal redemption. I say it with all reveren — the wronged and insulted God made the first m e! That is the order of our redemption. Paul procl ns the order a score of times in the benediction h n-vokes upon his fellow Christians. "Grace, me y, peace!" Grace is the primary fountain. The o in of man's peace is to be found in the divine grace.

BUT now how inefficient is the divine grace with it the cooperating willingness of man! How n-efficient is the enveloping atmosphere if we keep ur doors and windows closed! Some of you may l e read Frank Bullen's masterly book on his cruis n a whaler. You remember the chapter in which ie describes the sleeping-berths as being loathsome ns of stenchfulness and corruption. There the wh er floats in the faraway southern seas, a little hom of pestilence and stench, and yet immeasurable lea es of pure, fine, washed air press upon her and env p her, seeking to gain an entrance into her foul d noisome hull. But a hull can shut out the air of ie southern seas!

And here is the enveloping grace of God pres g about man, seeking an entrance into the unc n dungeons of his spirit. But how ineffective and n-potent it all is if we will not open our mind and rem e the barriers interposed by will! "Behold, I stan t the door and knock!" "How often would I," c s the Master, "but ye would not." But when e mind is opened, and the barrier of the will is remov l; when human willingness cooperates with divine gr e, then the clean atmosphere enters the foul dunge s, and in the mixing of the two atmospheres it is e unclean one that is destroyed. When you get hu n willingness to cooperate with divine grace, the fu -mental discordance of the life is abolished, peac s established, and the soul is partaker with God in m t intimate wedlock.

WITH the abolition of discordance, friction o comes to an end. The "grind" goes out f religion, out of the exercises of worship, out of e discharge of duty. The "yoke" becomes "easy," e burden becomes "light." Our "statutes" bec e "songs." The "oil of joy" gets into the life, and e limbs of the spirit move with exquisite smoothn .

No longer a grind, I say! Rather shall we sing w h the psalmist, "I delight to do thy will." No lon r shall we feel the rasping of restraint, but with e psalmist again we shall sing, "Oh how I love thy La '" Life in tune with the Infinite, and the will of e Infinite comes as a sweet accord.

Sound the Great Recall

SUNDAY, June 11. Matt. 16 : 9. "Do ye not remember the five loaves of the five thousand, and the many baskets ye took up?". In the midst of today's necessity, I am to recall the providence of yesterday. I am to sing of "His love in times past." I am to visit the Ebenezers I have built as memorials of my deliverance, and I am to look about for the altars of testimony which have been built by others. For other pilgrims have been along this road. This is not the first time that men have faced grim problems, and seen the teeth of gaunt hunger at their gates. And the recorded witness tells me that God was about, as well as hunger. The mighty Harvester was on the unsown waste, and the multitude was fed! And now, in our day, the necessity is huge, and our means are scanty. Sound the great recall! "Do ye not remember?" "Who through this weary pilgrimage hast all our fathers led?"

Do I not remember the inspired triumphs of the Lord's knights who fought the battle of the past? The roads along which we march are full of sacred reminiscence. Everywhere our common road is holy ground. "On this ground Christian stood, and up there came Apollyon against him. Behold, also, how here and there are yet to be seen upon the place some of the shivers of Apollyon's broken darts. . . . Verily, Christian did here play the man!" Thus is the road vocal with the witness of the King's knights. Let us listen to their witness, for "the Lord of hosts is with us and the God of Jacob is our refuge."

By God's grace, and by our own steady faith, and by the exploits which are born of grace and faith, let us make our way an illustrious yesterday for the children of tomorrow. Let our sons and daughters find "the shivers of Apollyon's broken darts," and let them visit the hallowed spots "where with our blows we did split the very stones in pieces." We owe to our posterity a noble witness to our God. When our children shall sound the great recall, let it be that the gathered volume of testimony shall contain the witness of God's dealings with us, and may their conflicts be all the more assured because we have such wonderful triumphs today. God Our Helper in Sore Trial

MONDAY, June 12. I Chron. 12 : 16–22. "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse." This is a most inspiring chapter, telling of the uprising around David of that new spirit which was to transform the Hebrew kingdom. The hold mentioned here is clearly the cave of Adullam, situated in the desolate regions which abut on the Dead Sea. There David was hiding from the envenomed hatred of Saul, and there the nucleus of his coming kingdom was assembling. The old order was changing, giving place to new, and God was preparing to fulfil himself in a new way. The parallel with our own times is exact.

Jesus is not yet king of the world in practical politics, though he is so in the divine order. We see not yet all things put under his feet. The kingdoms still rage, the kings of the earth take counsel together against the Lord and against his Christ. But though our Lord is not yet enthroned, as ere long he must be, and his kingdom is still in secret, there is gathering around him a great host, which is indeed the host of God. Many who were in distress and in debt and bitter of soul have gathered themselves unto him, and he has become their captain (I Sam. 22 : 2). Others have come, swift as the roes upon the mountains, and their faces are like the faces of lions. Some of them were equal to a hundred, and some, like Augustine, Luther and Knox, to a thousand. Ah, what a mustering of the clans has been going on during the Christian centuries, as one after another has joined the great host of God's elect! As each fresh recruit comes, the King goes forth with the testing inquiry: "Art thou come to help me?" If we can reply with Amasai, "Thine are we, Jesus, and on thy side, thou Son of God"; the Lord will answer, "Mine heart shall be knit unto you." Let us be so perfectly devoted to make Jesus King that he shall entrust himself to us with absolute faith, and choose us to share in the feast. F. B. M.

Religion and the Human Equation

TUESDAY, June 13. Isa. 43 : 5–7. "I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west." Frederick C. Howe, the United States Commissioner of Immigration, said recently that the chief factor in our relations to the immigrant was the human equation. The first thing that the immigrant looks for upon arriving at Ellis Island is a friend or an acquaintance. This he desires more even than work, for which he is usually eager. The immigrant will be seen frequently holding with great care a card or an envelope bearing an address on the East Side of New York City, or to some distant town or industrial center in the Middle West. It is the influence of friendship which counts with them, and their hearts are opened most quickly by personal kindness.

There are few greater open doors of opportunity for the truly religious man than the privileges offered at present to show brotherliness to some of the 10,500,000 immigrants who have landed in the United States since the opening of the twentieth century. We have a Christian duty toward them which has not been fulfilled. Certain churches are joining the various immigration and educational societies working for these people and assisting in teaching them English and inviting them to special services arranged in accordance with their needs.

What definite Christian thing can I do for one or more of these people? One friend of ours was the means, last year, of helping over 100 immigrants to discover what a Christian civilization really meant, by meeting them in his home, teaching them and assisting them in securing their naturalization privileges. What have we done? C. S. C.

The Heart's Desire for Jesus

WEDNESDAY, June 14. II Sam. 15 : 13–24. "The king himself passed over the brook Kidron." We cannot read of the rejection of David by Jerusalem and the nation, without recalling a greater King who passed by the same way. "When Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples over the brook Kidron." In each case there was a rejected king, and in each a group of devoted followers, who crossed the brook with him. Is there not a sense in which all of us must pass over that brook to join him, who at the present is still without the camp! We must go forth to him without the camp, bearing his reproach; and is there any phrase which will better set forth the inward intention of the soul than that of Ittai the Gittite, who, Philistine though he was, evinced a more entire devotion than many of David's sworn friends. "As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether for death or for life, even there also will thy servant be." Is it to be wondered at that David said unto Ittai, "Go and pass over." Will Jesus say less!

This personal, chivalrous love to Jesus is what we all need. Francis of Assisi had it when the vision of the Crucified pierced his heart and set it aflame. Thomas Aquinas had it when he heard a voice saying "Thomas, thou hast written well of me; what shall I give thee as reward?" and he replied, "I desire nothing but thyself, Lord." Bernard of Clairvaux had it when he wrote, "The love of Jesus, what it is, none but his loved ones know." Charles Wesley had it when he wrote, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." George Matheson, the blind preacher, had it when he wrote, "O Love That Wilt Not Let Me Go." We desire, not for that world alone, but for this, to be where Jesus is, whether for life or death; and it should be the one prayer that we never cease to utter: "O Spirit of God, one thing I ask of thee: make me to know and love Jesus Christ." But this lesson is best learnt when you have crossed the Kidron and found the Garden. F. B. M.

Light Bearers

THURSDAY, June 15. John 1 : 4. "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men." In describing the life of a great lady, an author said, "She was one of those beings who only glide through life, and who leave there a trace of light."

John the disciple of Jesus, a master of expression, said in delineating the character of Jesus, "In him was life, and the life was the light of men."

The present generation may have lost some of the rigorous self-discipline that was the feature of the Puritan's religion. We are less careful about the rules of religion, and there is less emphasis upon the penalties of sin and wrongdoing in the next world. One man told me recently that he thought this age had lost its religion, because it was so gay and easy going—it lacked in seriousness and in the consciousness of sin. That may be partially true.

Yet modern Christians are usually believers in the deep joyousness of Jesus, and they like to think of him as a light-bearer. The healing, loving side of the Master never fails to attract, and we like to think of him as our example in scattering light about him upon all burdened souls.

Some Christians seem to take little or no delight in their religion; their piety is painful to others—unnatural, almost inhuman. Jesus said, "I am the light of the world." Children looked into his face and smiled, sinners found at his side hope and forgiveness. Sorrow was turned into joy in his presence. The disciples' deepest sorrow was when He went away.

Am I a light-bearer? "Now are ye light in the Lord," said Paul; "walk as children of light."

The Love That Changeth Not

FRIDAY, June 16. Job 19 : 20-29. "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The Hebrew word is Goel, which in the book of Ruth is translated by "near kinsman." What Boaz was to Naomi and Ruth, when the two lonely women got back to Bethlehem, that Jesus is to us. He is our Protector, our Vindicator, our near Kinsman. He will plead our cause and redeem our inheritance, and give us hope and life. This is what Job needed, and by the inspiration of the Divine Spirit, he was assured that his Redeemer was waiting for the opportunity of performing the kinsman's part.

We know how truly these hopes and expectations have been realized by our Lord. Listen to those majestic words: "He, because he abideth for ever, hath an indissoluble priesthood"; and, "Having been made perfect, he became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation." Seventeen times the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews lays stress on that word eternal. Five or six times he quotes Ps. 110 : 4, where Jehovah pledges himself that Christ should forever exercise his office for us all. This is what we need. We are misjudged and misunderstood; we feel ourselves the prey and sport of malignant spirits; it seems as though Providence were against us, as it was against Job. Like him we cry out, "Have pity, friends, for the hand of God hath touched us." And then Jesus seems to stand beside us, saying, "Fear not, I have redeemed thee; I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine." The rivers shall not overflow, and the fire shall consume only the bonds that bind. Nothing shall separate us from our Kinsman's love, and there is no sacrifice which he is not prepared to make on our behalf. F. B. M.

Comfort and Assurance in His Word

SATURDAY, June 17. Ps. 119 : 89. "Forever, O Lord, is thy Word settled in heaven." The Divine Word is unchangeable. Its promises are sure; its precepts true. Without the absolute certainty of the Holy Scriptures, humanity would be adrift upon a troubled sea. God's Word is sure as the Rock of Ages. It is in the eternal heavens, settled and safe where no human power can touch it. Here we may rest, without fear or trembling.

The Word of God is in the Bible; the Word of God was made flesh; the Divine Word is wrapped up in a Person. It is a part of Him who cannot lie. His Name, his Nature and his Word are a trinity in unity. If one should fail, the heavens would fall. As the universe abides, held in the Creator's hands, so our souls are safe in the bosom of his love. Yea, more, for when worlds perish, "thou remainest." "Thou art the same," thy word and thy Child shall not fail.

An old Bible pilgrim, whose friends and relatives had nearly all passed away, who was doubled up with sciatica and often brutally beaten by the drunken son-in-law with whom he lived, was overheard to pray this prayer: "Sometimes, Lord, when I go to bed, I cannot sleep for my rheumatism, and then I begin to sing the hymn we used to sing, very softly, so as to disturb nobody in the house; and then I forget all about my rheumatism and my loneliness. I am in heaven, and I can see thee on the great White Throne, and I can hear the hallelujahs of the angels." It is the influence of the holy Book of God which lifts the soul up to the heights of the Delectable Mountains, whence we catch glimpses of the future glory.

The President and Peace

IN his address at Charlotte, N. C., a few days ago, on the anniversary of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, President Wilson gave what may be accepted as the first direct intimation that the time had come for the United States government to take steps with a view to ending the European war. His words were carefully guarded and rather the expression of a desire than a purpose; yet it was evident from the tenor of the whole address that a movement for peace was uppermost in his mind. The processes of the war, he said, stand still, neither side making much progress against the other. "When you cannot overcome, you must take counsel." The great war had ushered in a new age. Then came this significant passage:

"I would like, therefore, to think that the spirit of this occasion could be expressed if we imagined ourselves lifting some sacred emblem of counsel and of peace, of accommodation and righteous judgment, before the nations of the world and reminding them of that passage of Scripture, 'After the wind, after the earthquake, after the fire, the still small voice of humanity.'"

If this language is not mère rhetoric—a verbal flourish to please the ear—it can only mean that President Wilson at last recognizes that the time has come for our government to act. The Christian Herald, voicing the united desire of the American nation, has urged this course upon the Executive, as we feel that it is the proper time for American interposition in the interest of peace. All the neutral powers will be found ready to give the heartiest cooperation. They are organized with that end in view.

If the President be now convinced, as his speech just quoted would seem to clearly imply, that the moment for action has arrived, the sooner our great task is begun the better. Further delay could serve no good purpose and might result in calamitous failure on our part to perform the duty for which America has been so long preparing and toward which every thoughtful citizen has been looking forward with hopeful expectation. This nation must be found at the forefront, translating its ideals into practical acts, and helping our brothers in the old world back to the path of reason and righteousness and to a peace which, with God's blessing, we trust may be an enduring one.

Sunday Amusements

IN all the denominations today, the Sunday amusement question has become more or less an acute one. At the Presbyterian General Assembly, in session at Atlantic City, N. J., the subject came up in a rather unexpected fashion a few days ago, when the Committee on Sabbath Observance presented a resolution which was in effect a sweeping condemnation of all forms of amusement and work on the Lord's day. It advocated the abolition of motion picture shows and Sunday newspapers, abstention from baseball, golf, automobiling, tennis and kindred outdoor sports, and even the dropping of school and college studies which would compel the student to Sunday labor, in order to be prepared for Monday's class work. It called upon employers to recognize the right of the workers to a weekly rest, and that public officials, as well as private concerns, should regulate employment accordingly. One delegate, who rashly undertook to speak in justification of Sunday golf and baseball, and to expostulate mildly against placing a ban on certain outdoor sports, which he held ought to be permissible for those who had no other day for recreation or exercise, met with a storm of protests. It was in vain that he pleaded that the Bible itself did not specifically condemn Sunday recreation. The spirit of the Assembly was fully aroused in defence of the Lord's day from what it deems is a sacrilegious invasion. One speaker denominated the Sunday "movies" as "the modern Diana of the Ephesians." Others spoke of the automobile as responsible for drawing millions away from church, while golf was to be condemned not only for its effect on church attendance, but because it was the means of keeping away 100,000 young caddies from the Sunday school.

The adoption of the resolution, while it closes the debate as far as Presbyterians are concerned, and very clearly defines the attitude of that large and influential denomination on the question of Sunday amusements, may merely be regarded as a prelude to the discussion of the whole subject which must come, sooner or later, in all the denominations. It would, perhaps, be expecting the impossible to look for a uniform attitude on Sabbath observance. Some churches hold very broad views on the subject, while others, like our Presbyterian friends, are more rigid. It would be an excellent thing if some middle ground could be found, on which all the Protestant churches of America could unite, on this much discussed question which is in such a chaotic condition today. While the restrictive rules on keeping the Lord's day need not be oppressive, it is clear that a line must be drawn somewhere against the increase of Sabbath desecration.

The Army Bill

"PREPAREDNESS" suffered a severe setback at the hands of Congress in the passage of the Army Bill. Seldom has there been a more active propaganda on any measure than that which was conducted by the militarists, who hoped to secure the passage of a bill providing for an Army of much larger proportions. Colonel Roosevelt has been the foremost advocate of a fighting force of not less than 250,000 men. Congress, however, was evidently more strongly impressed by the anti-militaristic sentiment throughout the country than by the urgent entreaties, threats and blusterings from interested sources and it wisely chose the mid-way course. The measure passed by both Houses provides for a peace footing of 175,000 men, to be increased in time of emergency to 216,000 men. Provision is made for the federalization of the National Guard, the payment of the militia by the Federal government, the establishment of citizen training camps, and the construction of a government nitrate manufacturing plant to cost $20,000,000.00. Under the new measure, the Army enlargement plan will become operative on July 1 next, and will be completed in four years from that date. Retiring soldiers will go into the reserve, and it is expected that in ten years the country will be able to have at call a trained force of 600,000, independent of the available strength to be supplied from the training camps, which might easily double the number, thus making a force approximating a million men—regulars, reserves, and trained citizenry—available for any serious emergency. As was anticipated, the passage of the Army Bill has been greeted with a chorus of complaints from the advocates of unrestrained "preparedness" and the militaristic press. Even the President himself is said to have been surprised and disappointed. Congress, however, has fairly heeded the sentiment of the country in not giving way to the war hysteria. The new bill is really a far-reaching measure, amply sufficient to meet the military needs of the nation and to provide by well-planned stages for Army development in the future to an extent which, while it will in no sense "militarize" the country, will be equal to all its needs.

Privacy of the Telephone

NEW YORK CITY is in a furor of excitement over the problem of the privacy of the telephone. Two officials have been indicted by the Grand Jury for "wire tapping," and the Mayor and Police Commissioner have been severely criticised in many quarters for having approved of the act for which the indictment has been rendered. The Mayor, in defending his position before the Thompson Investigating Committee, made a startling charge that certain clergy of the Catholic Church had been engaged with others in a conspiracy to discredit and hinder the city administration. While it is too early at this present writing to express an opinion on the merits of the case between the Mayor and these opponents, right-thinking people will welcome his brave declaration: "If there is one thing that is fundamental in American life, it is that just as we declare that Government shall not lay its hands upon the altar of the Church, so the Church shall not lay its hands upon the altar of Government."

As to the wire-tapping controversy, the laws provide that private telephones shall be truly private, and that not only must wires not be tapped but that no one has a right to "listen in" on any conversation. The present law provides that if the Police Department has reasonable grounds for suspecting that a crime has been committed or is about to be committed, private wires may be intercepted on an order from the Court. No one could find fault with this provision if the efficiency and honesty of the Police Department could always be assured.

One case of the wire tapping in New York brought out the explanation that plots against the Government were under way. Here again the difficulties of fixing the limits of privacy are subtle. But no one can question the right of duly authorized State or Federal officials to tap wires or employ other extreme measures in their investigations if they have strong and reasonable grounds for suspecting that plots against the Government are being concocted.

It has been justly stated that in such a democracy as America, the spy system, upon which the desp sms and autocracies of the Old World are largely sed, could not be tolerated. On the other hand, th very spirit of democracy demands that no citizen sho l be allowed, in the exercise of his own rights, to jeop dize the rights and welfare of the people as a whole And the public is coming to demand that both in bu ness and in politics the methods employed shall be th e of frank and fearless openness which court rathe han shun publicity.

Welcome to the New Bishops

A HOST of Methodists the world over wi welcome to their hearts and homes and ch hes the knowledge of the names of the new bi ops, the reprints of their photographs, the informat n of their previous work for the church. The Met dist people everywhere love their bishops, read heir printed sermons and messages to the church, and l k to them as the spiritual leaders of the denominatio

It is a matter for special congratulation that a ong the group of new bishops are men whose humi y is truly famous. It has been one of the curses the whole Christian church from the beginning tha nen who are self-seeking and ambitious have occasi ally schemed and worked their way into these high ces which should be occupied only by the most hu ole, self-sacrificing and self-forgetful members of Cl st's flock. We are not thoroughly familiar with a the careers of the newly elected bishops, but we u erstand that one of them, at least once before, r sed to become a candidate for the Episcopacy, feeling hat the more humble work he was doing at that tim vas of greater importance to the church than any s ice he might render as a bishop; that another ac ally resigned the rank and title of missionary bish to become a secretary of the Missionary Society nd that another has been known in his work, and pa cularly in his stalwart acts and contentions as a me ber of the General Conference which made him bish as a champion of the rights and needs and hopes he laboring class.

This is the sort of men needed in this new a to lead the new church to new victories. Men wh are humble, men who know God and have seen him ee to face, men whose hearts beat sympatheticall for and whose hands are strong to work for the multi les who toil.

Rivers of Prayer

IT is impossible even for the editors of the Chri an Herald themselves to realize the full measu of the power and enthusiasm of the Christian inte sts and efforts of their readers. In the Prayer Lea ue, for instance, we have realized that thousands of le rs were coming month by month from readers in va us kinds of anxiety and trouble, asking the praye of their fellow Christians. But a recent occurrence se ed to emphasize the real sweep of the movement. It happened that for two weeks through difficulti in making up the paper the weekly summary of class ed requests for prayer was omitted from the colum of the Christian Herald. When the summary was e-pared for the third week, including the requests or the two preceding weeks, it was found that, to n-stance one item alone, five hundred and nine n requests for prayer for the healing of others had en received during the three weeks.

The mystery of prayer is still unsolved. But e power of prayer has been abundantly proved. E y week the columns of the Christian Herald r witness to God's willingness to heal and help in ans er to prayer and faith.

Other items of this three weeks' summary are aln st equally impressive as this nearly half a thousand o have asked prayer for the bodily healing of frie s. Sixty-one ask prayer for mental healing for themse s or others; forty-seven for restoration or strengthe g of sight; one hundred and forty for a deeper worl f grace.

Steadily these streams of prayer flow upward to e Throne of Grace. Steadily and richly the div e blessing flows back to the souls and minds and bo s of those in pain and in need. This is a good time to k whether or not we are individually receiving for r own lives the abundant blessings promised to th e who pray, and whether or not our prayers are help g as they might to bring God's saving and heal g blessing to the lives of others.

"Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, a l excessive dislike for another, cause those who they actuate to see danger only on one side.' George Washington.

B quest to Veteran Ministers

MRS. JAMES, who died in April, among her generous benefactions le $750,000 to the veteran minis- te and the widows and children of de ased preachers of the Methodist E copal, the Presbyterian and the C gregational Churches, a total gift of 2,250,000 to this worthy cause. Su an amount in these days of pr ely giving would not be considered as rge if left to educational institutions, h itals, asylums, and so forth, but for th care of "wornout" preachers and th families the amount is exception- al large, perhaps the greatest amount ev given by any one person to this sp ific charity. It is a wonder that the ve rich have paid so little attention to is most worthy benevolence. Since ap tolic times no ministers have been m devoted or self-sacrificing than th of the past generation, and no c has contributed to the material, m tal or moral benefit of society more th they. Fortunately, there is an aw ening in most of the denomina- ti on this subject, and God's children ar hearing and helping to answer this pr er: "Now also when I am old and gr headed, O God, forsake me not" (P 71:18.)

Iushrooms Grow in Mine

S ME of the markets of the cities are selling a fine quality of mushrooms th have a singular origin. They are gr n in a coal mine. Near Morgantown, W. Va., there is an old deserted coal mine, known as the Pittsburg Coal Seam in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The mine was worked for a number of years, furnishing its output mainly as fuel to the people of the neighborhood. Theodore F. Imbach, an assistant in the State Agricultural Experiment Station at Morgantown, had an idea that the abandoned coal mine would make an ideal place for raising mushrooms. Securing a permit from the owners of the property, he took possession of the first level, and found by chemical analysis that the soil, drainage, and temperature were exactly what these fungi required, and now the mine sends weekly shipments of the luxury to the markets. Mushrooms are a dangerous article of food, as poisonous varieties are easily mistaken for edible ones. A resident of Pelham Manor, N. Y., had taken great care to raise a new edible variety of mushrooms. The other day she had the first dish of the delicacy on the table. Five partook of it and were seized with illness, and their lives were only saved by the prompt attendance of a physician. The incident caused Assistant Director Murrill of the Botanical Garden to issue a bulletin warning against the new poison plant and giving an accurate description of the harmless, healthful variety. Extreme caution is necessary, as the papers constantly make mention of fatal mistakes in the eating of mushrooms. There are articles in the mental and moral world that look like food, but are like the deadly toadstool. There is this mention of putting a poison vegetable into the food by mistake: "And it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out, and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot. And they could not eat thereof." (II Kings 4:40.)

Elephant Helps in Predicament

A LEADING show had given an entertainment in one of the large cities of the country and was preparing to leave for the next place scheduled, when one of the parade chariots got stalled in mud over the hubs. Sixteen of the strongest horses tugged together at the load in vain. A man was sent to the elephant quarters to get "Albert" and to see if he could help them out of a hole. Albert cannot talk, that is, in a language people can understand excepting his keeper. But in actions that spoke louder than words he sensed the situation exactly, and set himself to the task of relief. He told the men to get away from the wagon, and to whip up the horses. As they did so, he put his head against the back of the chariot and pushed it out of the mud and on its journey, amid the cheers of the showmen and the spectators who by this time had gathered about. Albert modestly returned to his fellows and went with them to the next town. Among the lower tribes elephants rank among the highest in intelligence. From the earliest times they have been trained to industrial arts and for war. Sticking in the mud physically has been quite common in this world. It is said that scarcely ten per cent. of those who start in business ever succeed. And then some strong man or institution has to help the wagon out of the mire. Many get stalled mentally on the roadway of life. Few comparatively who undertake the learned professions succeed in them. Many slip into some mire of difficulty and are unable to extricate themselves. The whole race has fallen into the mire of native depravity and wilful sin. People flounder in the mud, only sinking deeper in their unaided efforts to extricate themselves. The divine hand only can take the soul out of the mire and place it on solid ground. The figure of a soul stalled in the mire of sin, and a picture of the divine help necessary for the rescue is here given: "Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink." (Ps. 69:14.)

Recovering Deep Water Wrecks

IN harmony with the progress of science in all the departments of nature and human endeavor, the mastery of the sea on its surface and down in its depths has been marked. The Submarine Diving and Recovering Company, after four years of experimental work, reports that it has succeeded in building two complete metal diving suits that will do work in extreme depths of water. The company intends to build and properly equip a wrecking vessel for deep sea salvage work. Millions upon millions of dollars' worth of property and of silver and gold each year sink down so deep from wrecks on the ocean that the hand of no diver, however expert, has been able to reach them. The new invention promises to go down as deep into the sea as is necessary to reclaim treasures out of the wreck. How many soul treasures are thrown into the depths of the sea by the wrecks of human life! But there is One who can reach and restore them. Of him it was said, "For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Luke 19:10.)

Sobriety in France

TWO great anti-liquor meetings were held in France on May 8—one in the Sorbonne, Paris, and the other at Rouen. Professor Paul Painleve, minister of public instruction, was the principal speaker at the Sorbonne meeting. He said the fight against liquor must be continued with the greatest energy. Both meetings adopted resolutions urging Parliament to pass measures to suppress the liquor traffic, notably by the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of "appetizers" having alcohol as a base, and also preventing private distillers from marketing their output. Before the war there was a widespread temperance reform in France. Since then, in company with other European nations, it has passed drastic excise laws, abolishing absinthe, shortening the hours of sale one-half, and regulating the relation of women to drink. Nations as well as individuals are realizing that "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." (Prov. 20:1.)

Clara Kellogg

MRS. CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG STRAKOSCH, who for a generation retained a place among the most famous American singers, died at her home, Elpstone, New Hartford, Conn., on Saturday, May 13, and was buried the Monday following. For some time she had been calmly awaiting her death. Her cool philosophy and earnest Christian faith attracted the attention of the whole country, while the people recalled her long career of musical triumphs at home and abroad. The funeral service was simplicity itself, as she had planned it—no display, not even any singing. Many notables attended. A large proportion of the world's great singers have been of foreign birth. Now and then one like Clara Louise Kellogg has appeared as a native product of our soil. Miss Kellogg represented the best American ideals in her good common sense, in her simple manners, and in the painstaking work which she put into the mastery of her profession. Her voice naturally was exquisitely beautiful and was technically trained in this country and in the capitals of Europe. Fortunately it did not have the heart cultivated out of it. In her prime she won the applause of the critics, and popular audiences in her own country and the crowned heads of Europe were glad to hear and honor her. In the midst of so great publicity and popular admiration she maintained her personal integrity and simple Christian faith in a singular manner, so that her life, like her voice, was a joyful anthem, an inspiring melody. The sweet singer counted her voice as an instrument of service. "And with my song I will praise him." (Ps. 28:7.)

"Slide"

By ARTHUR
HOAG

EF Slide hadn't of went and took the horn along on that straw ride it would of ben all right. Sal would of stood anything but that, and the rest of us would of stood by Slide. But he just naturally overdid the matter that night, just like you might be bound to expect he would—knowin' Slide.

Trouble with Slide was he couldn't never get the other feller's point of view. Now, music is all right. There ain't nobody can rightly find fault with that per cee. I think it is William Shakespeare who gives his small opinion of the man that ain't got no music in himself. He allows, I believe, that such an individual is fit for tar, feathers and spoiled eggs. That may be a leetle too strong, but anyhow that wuz what William thought, so I suppose he had a right to say so.

But we all like music. That wuz where Slide misjudged us. And again it wasn't the music of a sliphorn per cee that we objected to. Slide wuz probably right in believing that there ain't no better music nowhere than the music of a slide trombone *cor*rectly handled. And Slide could certainly handle the music end of it all right. Only part bothered Slide was the loose end of his horn. He couldn't never seem to figure up how much room it would *re*quire.

THE band boys tell a funny thing happened one night they wuz a-goin' up to Albany. There wuz some eggrejus big doin's up there, and our boys they kind of wanted to go fur the picnic end of it, so they got themselves hired to go up and play. And our boys kin play — specially Slide—or could, fur he ain't around here no more. Ef it hadn't of ben for that straw ride—but I wuz about to *re*hearse what happened to Slide goin' up in the night boat. Him and Bill Bundy had a state room together, and Slide he wuz powerful impressed with the importance of the occasion. To go and play music in a distant city like that wuz certainly a very preposterous thing, so Slide he insisted on practicin' some after him and Bill had went in to go to bed. Bill says that Slide he sot down on one of the little stools they give 'em in them state rooms instid of chairs, and took his horn out of its case.

"Lawzee, Slide!" said Bill, "you ain't goin' to practice now, air ye?"

"I sure am," says Slide. "There's a cadenzy at the end of the Andanty in that Belle of the Alleghanies Overture what I ain't quite overcome yit. And I make it a rule," he says, "never to go to bed without conquerin' complete everything I'm plumb sure I've got to play the next day."

Here again you see how *cor*rect Slide's idees were per cee. But he couldn't never seem to make no adjustments.

"Well, Slide," says Bill, "I tell you right now ef you go to practicin' that cadenzy in here at this time of night the captain will throw me and you both, and the horn, too, and my drum, right into the river, and that'd be worse than not knowin' your cadenzy."

Well, that kind of seemed to strike home, and Slide he meditated some, but goin' on and unpackin' his horn and gettin' it into action just the same, Bill side-steppin' all the time, tryin' to git ondressed and keep out of Slide's way.

"Well," says Slide, "I'm goin' to practice silent then. I'll strike the positions all right and go through the overture, but I won't make no noise."

Bill wuz some apprehensive even yet. He wuz pretty sure Slide'd strike something more besides his positions, and he didn't have no very great faith in his bein' able to suppress his soul when he got to what he called the crusendo passage of that cadenzy. But he know'd there wuzn't no use in tryin' to head Slide off no more, since by this time he'd got the mouthpiece up to his lips.

Well, sir, Bill says he never had such an anxious time ondressin' in all his life. He wuz a-settin' on the side of the lower bed and Slide he wuz a-settin' on his stool, and Slide wuz so excited tryin' not to blow that he wuz more reckless than ever 'bout the loose end of his horn.

Bill leaned over to onhook his shoes—and, Bing! Slide's horn caught him on the cheek.

He looked up, kind uv hopin' Slide would apologize. He hadn't never ben known to yit, but Bill thought the time had come when he'd ort to do it, or be made to. Stid o' that, Slide he said:

"What you want to go and git in my way for, Bill? How can I practice with you fallin' all over me?"

Well, after all, Bill knew there wuzn't no use arguin', for Slide wuz allez more or less beside himself when he really got down to business, so Bill he tried to aidge furder off. But it wuzn't no use. He wuz plumb as fur away as he could git and wuz just in the act of pullin' off his shirt when, biff! Slide's horn took him right in the pit of the stomach. And Slide himself wuz so surprised that he forgot to hold in his breath, and he let out a blast that you could of heard clear from there to Albany.

They wuz both scared good and proper then. They thought the captain would be right in on 'em. So Slide he motioned to Bill to turn out the light, and Bill he clumb up on the top bed, and Slide, him and his horn, they got into the bottom-bed, and they laid there in the dark till they saw the captain wuzn't comin'. Then Slide he come out and turned on the light and Bill he clumb down to finish ondressin'. Bill's feelin's wuz very much hurt, to say nothin' of his stomach—he had et quite hearty, he says—but he knowed it would only complicate matters to try to git Slide to acknowledge he had virtually ben committin' assault and battery.

WELL, by that time Slide had made up his mind he couldn't practice with any good results till Bill wuz out of the way, so he sot still, lookin' very glum, till Bill finally shinned up and got into bed. Bill says he wuz just droppin' off to sleep when there come a slam that made him think the boat had ben run into. He looked over the aidge of his bed, and there wuz Slide din' both hands over his uth his precious horn a yin' careless on the floor.

"What on airth th matter, Slide?" say Bill

"There ain't noth th matter," says Slide, kin down his hands, " cep that this here boat too small."

He wouldn't tell l no more that night, but tl next mornin' he explained t t h wuz just finishin' up th ver ture, and wuz peggin long on the home stretch th finaly, where there w a sorts of climaxes and sen dos, not makin' no oise whatever, and he h to make a sudden reach the seventh position, a he kind of leaned forwar like to get it good and ecis and correct, when, Ba ! his horn smashed up clea agin the other end of th tat room, and nearly k ked out Slide's two fro nos upper teeth. Slide g up then, Bill says, and w t to bed.

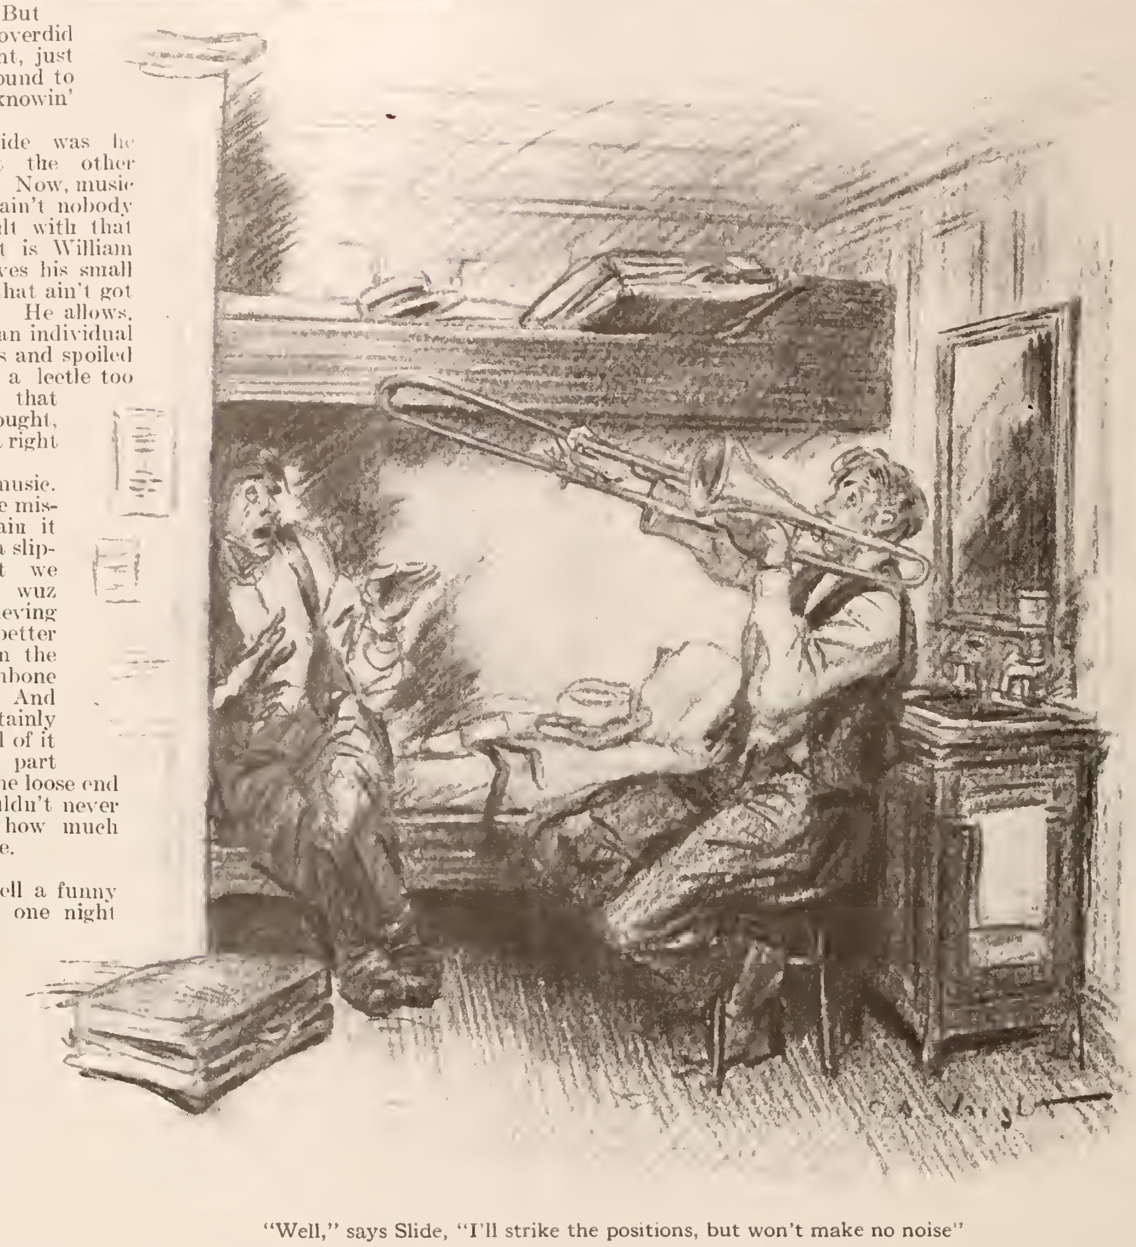
But about that stra ride. Still, even that migl not have turned out so fat like it did, ef Slide hadn't vent down to Asbury Pa the summer before. He ome back more absent-i ded than ever; more sot hi conviction that musi wuz purty nigh the only hing wuth thinkin' about; and that uv all the in creation the music the slide trombone wuz s test and best.

IT wuz all on acco t of that young feller yer. We'd all heard tell u here of how he could pla the trombone, and nothin' ould do Slide but he must g hear him. Well, he went. d to hear him tell it! He s l he sot there afternoon fter afternoon, and night fter night, for five hull da on that there what the call "pavilion," payin' teen cents to get on, and me times more, I think. A the water would come a-s hin up right onderneath here they sot, and at nig between the pieces you could git up and look ov the rail and see the black waves come a-rollin' in and then all of a suddent turn white and come his up onderneath the building—built right out ov the sand it is, and part of it part of the time righ over the water—when the tide's high, that is—a th stars a-blinkin' and the sea lyin' so queer and da and still and big—and them waves a-roarin' and a-b kin and a-swishin' right onderneath ye—and By he played.

Well, sir, Slide he said there wuzn't no use tr " to describe it. He said that all the beautiful thin you ever see or thought of or wished fur or smel l or tasted come true when Byer played. He said her wuz thunder storms and star-shine and mo ght and clover blossoms and peacock's feather and angels and mince pie and roses and hollyhock the whole kit and bilin' of 'em filled with love and g y—when Byer played.

He led the band, too, Byer did. And Slide he led 'em kind of odd. He didn't beat time jus with his hand or his stick like most leaders do, but w his whole body all over like. It just seemed as the music wuz all inside of him and he'd kind of just tly jar it out of himself whilst these fellers wuz a-b vin' their horns, and the white waves a-swishin' der-neath. All sorts of pieces they played—funny on and sad ones and big ones and little ones and har nes and easy ones, but then every little while the ple would stiddy down and the girls would stop a-g lin' and it almost seemed, Slide said, as if the wave ind of stopped a-swishin', and Byer he'd come ou with his trombone, and seems to me Slide said he ln't even take off his white kid gloves, and he'd p ye all around up through the milky way and back wn by the old home and call up the faces of ever ody that had ever loved ye, and ye'd be gettin' drun ith lilac blossoms when he'd take down his horn an ind of bow, and pick up his stick and get ready to le the band off onto the next piece.

Well, Slide wuz never quite the same after he ard him. He said it proved what he'd always kno d—that the trombone wuz the very topmost king all musical apparatuses. And he wuz goin' to stic o it



"Well," says Slide, "I'll strike the positions, but won't make no noise" and keep at it and get just as near high up where this man Byer wuz as he could, he said.

AND for the matter of that, Slide could play. He played in church and Sunday school and at sociables and supprize parties, but he went one too many when he tried to play at a straw ride. But in the band! Geewhittaker-lawzee! you should of seen Slide play in the band!—on the march especially. Why sir, when Slide wuz all dressed up in that blue uniform the band boys wears, with gold buttons and gold stripes on their arms and gold stripes down the laigs of their pants, and gold eppelets, him a-marchin' in the front row with his trombone all shined up like a million gold mirrors and a-workin' his arm back and forth to beat all creation, and kind of swingin' his head to the music—I tell you we wuz all proud of Slide.

But he hadn't never ought to of went and took his horn along on that straw ride. That wuz certainly the aggravatedest case of Slide's forgettin' how much room his trombone took up that the community ever witnessed. And after all, that wuz the root and all the branches of the whole trouble. Slide couldn't never seem to realize that the universe wan't geared up and society wan't organized with a slide trombone as the unit of measurement. Slide allez figured it out that way, especially after he seen Byer. A slide trombone is the most beautiful, most important, most useful thing in all the heavens and the earth; therefore any place you can't take and operate a trombone in is too small. Or rather, he figured there wan't no sich places, for any place where business or pleasure might call a man he must of course take his trombone along. Even on a straw ride. Sal had already put up with a good bit from Slide. When she'd play the organ, he'd stand up 'longside of her playin' his horn, either playin' a solo or else playin' bass whilst the rest sang. And it would of ben all right ef Slide could of kept his wits about him. But it's just like I say—when he got to playin' he went crazy. Long as he wuz playin' something he didn't know any too well he wuz safe, fer he had to keep so near Sal to look over at the music that she wuzn't in no real danger. He'd stand, sometimes to the right of her, sometimes to the left, screwin' over his head to watch the notes and pumpin' the trombone out along across the room. It certainly wuz wonderful how Slide could twist himself so's he could look sideways and play backwards—but when he struck a place he knowed right well Sal would always kind of duck, fer she wuz pretty sure what wuz goin' to happen. Slide he'd work off away from her, takin' his eyes off the music, and playin' around almost anywhere. Then he'd feel a place comin' he wasn't quite sure of and begin to aidge back nearer Sal. And nine times out of ten, before he'd git back where he belonged, he'd hafto make one of them quick dives of his and Sal she'd get it right side the head.

But she didn't never do nothing but just laugh. And that would kind of rile Slide. He couldn't onderstand why she and all the others wanted to interrupt the music for.

Well, as I say, Sal would of stood all that, but what happened at the straw ride wuz too much fer her. Of course everybody recognizes that there had ought to be horns along on a straw ride but not trombones—not by no means! But when Sal come downstairs to let Slide in when he come to her house to wait till the bob come along to git 'em there he stood with his horn. He hadn't even brought along the case of “Lawzee, Slide,” sez Sal, “you ain't goin' to take your trombone along, air you?”

And he said, “I sure am Sal. Don't everybody expect there to be horn-blowin' on a straw ride?”

Sal was very dubious, but she see there wan't no use tryin' to think of dissuadin' Slide. So she didn't say nothing.

Well, finally the sled come along and Sal and Slide piled in. Now, of course ef Slide had of took his horn up alongside the driver and played out along over the horses' backs, nobody wouldn't of found no fault. It would probably of mixed in very nice with the bells and the singin'. But of course, like the right thing never did, that didn't occur to Slide. Anyhow, of course naturally he wanted to sit 'longside of Sal.

Well, they finally got started, and first off Slide let the horn rest right along lenthways of the sled, over the people's knees, all the time a-yellin' at 'em fer fear they'd step on it or fall over it or squeeze it or bend it or something

AFTER a while some one started up a song, and Slide he raised up the horn, and the first thing he did, not bein' quite sure what key they wuz singin' in, he made that long reach of his fer the seventh position and knocked off Abe Milner's hat. Well, of course they had to stop singin' and stop the horses. And you'd of thought it would of occurred to Slide that it might be his duty to go out and get Abe's hat. Not by no means! Abe had got in his way and in the way of the glorious art of music, and he could pile out and get his own hat.

Next party to suffer wuz little Mary Jones. Right plump on the nose she got it. And Sal she spoke right up.

“Slide,” she says, very sharp, “I'm ashamed of ye!”

Everybody stopped singin', and there wuz a very appallin' stillness, all except the sleigh bells. Little Mary Jones wuz holdin' her handkerchief over her face and tryin' not to cry, fer Slide had give her a right smart rap.

“Ashamed of me, Sal?” said Slide. “What do you mean? Don't I play the horn good enough?” he said, thinkin' of Byer.

“Sure, Slide,” said Sal, very still like. “You play the horn good enough. But you had ought to be more careful.”

Well, at that Slide was very mad. He seemed to think that him, and Byer, and music, and all trombones, had ben grievously insulted and wounded, and that by a woman him and them had allez loved and stood up fer. So he called out over to Abe.

“Say, Abe,” he sez, “change places with me, won't you? Me and Sal hez fell out.”

Well, there ain't hardly any use to go on. You can see plain as day what happened. It wuz bound to happen. Any one would of knowed it wuz bound to happen—any one but Slide.

After the storm had kind of blew over and they had all settled down talkin' and laughin' again, somebody kind of started to sing again, thoughtless like. But Slide he pricked up his ears and picked up his horn. He wuz more oneasy than ever, fer Abe and Sal seemed to be havin' a pretty good time over in their part of the sleigh. Abe wuz allez more or less overly fond of Sal anyhow, and she'd off and on ben quite partial to him—before Slide come. And there they wuz a-settin' 'tother side of the sled, three or four places off.

Well, Slide brung his trombone up into action, and kind of found the place, and they all joined in, goin' kind of careful at first, but lettin' themselves out more as they see Slide didn't seem inclined to do any more damage. He had his horn kind of kitty-cornered, and had found a vacant place in the atmosphere between Sal's head and her neighbor on this side of her.

The song kept goin' better and better, and by the time they lit into the chorus for the second time they wuz all stretchin' their lungs the best they knowed, and Slide he wuz in his glory.

And then all of a suddent it happened. Slide lost his head with the swing of the music, and havin' to make that long reach again, he kind of jerked forward,—and, Slam!

Poor Sal!

Nobody that knowed Slide could have suspicioned fer a minute that he done it a-purpose. But he done it all right. Sal hez got a dreadful pretty mouth, and if there wuz anybody in the county that had ort to have knowed that wuzn't the way to use it, it had ort to of ben Slide. But that's what he done anyhow, him and his trombone. She had turned her head away from Abe at the time, too, and wuz lookin' straight at Slide, so what she got was a good straight drive, no glancin' blow, ner anything like that.

There wuz a very awkward pause. The music broke right off short, and Sal she begun to cry. It wuz kind of queer of Sal, fer she is plucky all right, and wuz more or less used to Slide's raps. But this one had ben a corker, and it had evidently took her by supprize. Everybody seemed to realize that something would have to be done prompt and severe. Things clearly couldn't go on no longer like they wuz. Finally Abe spoke up, onderstandin' that all the men wuz willin' to back him.

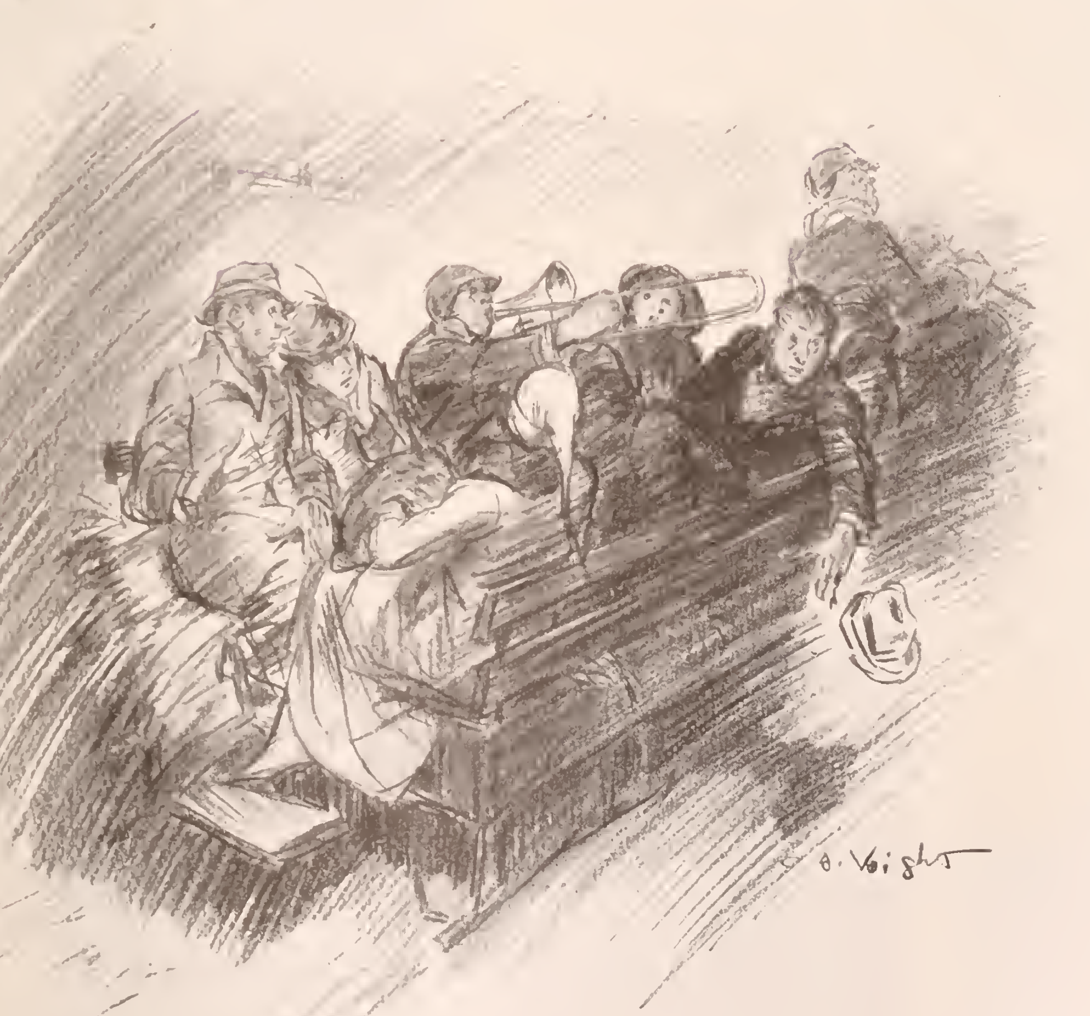
“Look at here, Slide,” he says. “This thing has went fur enough. It's very evident,” he says, “that you need a wider speer for your excellencies and activities. There clearly ain't room fer you in this here sled, and I rather misdoubt,” he says, “whether there's room fer you in this town. You'd best just take your horn and go to some place where everything is built on a larger scale. Then you can jambouree round as much as you like and not do nobody no harm.”

Slide waited fer somebody to speak up, but nobody didn't. So he yelled up to the driver to stop; and he clumb out and went home.

AND that's the last anybody hez seen of Slide. Course Abe didn't mean all he said, and the men didn't expect Slide would take it so to heart. They meant to give him a lesson, but they didn't have no idee he'd light out like that and not come back no more.

And we miss Slide all right. Seems like there wuz more room round here than we all realized. Sal especially; she don't seem nothing like so peart as she wuz, and I can't see that Abe makes no great headway. And the band ain't scarcely holdin' together at all.

Well, the postmaster wuz tellin' me Sal's ben gettin' a letter a week now fer about three weeks from way out West sommers, and he hez an idee the handwritin' is Slide's. And come to think of it, I don't believe Sal hez looked quite so downhearted fer about that lenth of time. Well, ef it is Slide, and we all get a right to vote whether he'll call Sal out there or come on back here hisself, him and his trombone, I reckon we'll vote unanimous for the latter proposition. Even Abe. Fer he knows he ain't really got no chanst.



“The first thing Slide did, he made that long reach for the seventh position”

A Morning Prayer

The following lines have been sent in to the Christian Herald by a correspondent who does not know the author.

“Now I wake and see the light;
'Tis God who kept me through the night.
To him I raise my heart and pray
That he would keep me through the day.
Lord, bless not only food and drink,
But all I do and say and think,
So that in all my work and play,
No sin may grieve thee, Lord, this day.
And should I die before 'tis done,
O God, accept me through thy Son, Amen.”

The Gate to the Klondike Gold

CONTINUING FRANK G. CARPENTER'S ALASKA STORY

(Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter)

EIGHTEEN years ago Skagway was one of the most talked-of towns in the world. It was the chief gate to the rich gold fields of the Klondike, and miners came by the thousands to tramp their way over the passes in order that they might get to the headwaters of the Yukon and float down to Dawson. A little later it became the terminus of the White Pass Railway, which runs from here to White Horse, the head of the navigation of the Yukon; and within a short time it sprang from a village of tents to a bustling city of wood and stone of 15,000 population. The most of the citizens were transients who were moving back and forth from the gold mines. Then the mines began to play out, and the blood of Skagway grew weak. Drunk with prosperity, it demanded the gold cure, but the cream had been skimmed from the Klondike and the bottle was empty. The miners grew fewer and fewer, and the city dwindled and pined until it now has, all told, only five or six hundred.

The saloons and dance halls of the past have all disappeared. The hotels and rooming shacks have rotted away and many of the better class houses are vacant. The town has changed from a wide-open community of gamblers, fortune-hunters and miners to a staid little settlement which lives on the travelers who pass through on their way to Yukon territory and the interior of Alaska, and on the tourists who come north every season to see glaciers and other wonders of this southeastern part of the territory.

As it is now, several hundred steamers call at Skagway every season and they bring thousands of passengers. Many take the continuous round trip, but many also stop off at Skagway for a few days or weeks. The place is fast becoming a summer resort. It has a mild climate with much less rain than other parts of the Panhandle. In the immediate vicinity are a half-dozen glaciers and not far away is Glacier Bay, one of the greatest glacier gardens of the whole world. It is the scene of much of the work of John Muir, and there are the Muir Glacier and others which he discovered. In addition Skagway offers no end of excursions which one can make on horseback, on foot or by motor boat, and he will find new things at every step or at every chug of the engine. Just now there is talk of building a great tourist hotel here, and the travel will increase as soon as our people awake to the wonders of Alaska and know they can be comfortably housed and fed while they enjoy them.

The interesting things of Alaska are not confined to the rocks, the mountains, the snow and the ice. As far as this part of the country is concerned, the latter is found only in the glaciers. The winters are such that there is no ice to speak of, and in summer Skagway is of the greenest of green. Just now great beds of white clover grow on the sides of the streets, and the hills are covered with bushes and wild flowers. Many of the residents have garden patches, where they grow all the vegetables used by the town. I saw one patch of raspberries this morning which had bushes as high as my head and berries as thick as my thumb. I saw rhubarb with leaves as big as two pages of a newspaper, and stems that reached to my shoulders.

The flag and a band draw a crowd in Skagway

One of the flower gardens I visited was that of Mr. F. J. Weber, who is in charge of the shops of the White Pass Railway. He is a business man with a great love for nature. He has more than forty varieties of dahlias and those of every color and tint. Some are snow white, some blood red and others of a delicate salmon. He has even blue dahlias of the deep hue of the mountains far off in the distance.

And such dahlias! The stems of some of the plants reached to a height of nine feet, and their blossoms were as big around as dinner plates. I took my two-foot rule and found that this was so by actual measure. One blossom was nine inches wide. Its color was purple. Another, a geisha dahlia with blossoms of old gold and fiery red, measured more than ten inches from side to side. Indeed, the size of the flowers was so great that I had self photographed standing at the ro s on one of the plants to make the su give his testimony to the truth of my ory. The stem reached so high above m hat I could just touch the blossom and as I looked up the flower seemed hig as a pie pan. Nevertheless, it grew om a bulb that was planted this s ng, having been sprouted out in the en. just about two months ago. The ul from which it came is in its f rth year, having been first planted in 12

The most of these dahlias are owing, not in hothouses, but right (in the open. They are on beds in a wn and their only protection is a ndshield, a wire fence walled with ass which faces the channel to keep o the cold blasts from the sea and the r untains. Among the other flowe in Mr. Weber's garden I saw mar lds five inches wide and red gera ms equally large. There are also Jap ese golden-banded lilies with flowers a ong as your hand. I counted nineteen ich lilies on one single plant.

Going back to my hotel, I saw i one of the store windows two tubs of raniums with stems as high as a ma nd with red blossoms twelve inch in circumference.

In Skagway they grow dahlias as big as dinner plates

WHEN gold was first discover in the Klondike there were wo roads or trails from the head of the nn Canal over the mountains. One st ted here at Skagway and climbed up th gh the White Pass to Lake Bennett nd then went on down the Yukon to wson. The other began at Dyea, ich is four miles away, and went ove he Chilkoot Pass to the Yukon. At rst Dyea had the lead. It built a m, running on a cable, that ca ed freight up the pass, although the assengers had to walk, or, as they ay here, "mush it" on foot. As the ars rose into the air, upheld by the ire rope, they swung this way and at, and now and then some of the fr ht was spilled out. Once the train ca ed ninety-four hogs. The motion de them dizzy and seasick, and half of em jumped from the cars and left ge grease spots on the rocks far belov

Another time, a woman came ng with a parrot. She was told tha he bird would be carried and that al he had to do was to hang the cage ir he car. She was afraid to risk her ar Polly, and so she took him out nd carried him up on her wrist. She nt the cage by the train, and, wher he had climbed to the top, found th it was so crushed that it could not be d.

By and by the White Pass rai ay was built and the miners were take by steam over the mountains. This sou ed

Good Cookies Made Better with Crisco

NEARLY everybody likes cookies. Childhood fondness for them is one that lasts. Now with the use of Crisco they are more delicious than ever.

CRISCO
For Frying - For Shortening For Cake Making

Every virtue of this purely vegetable, odorless and tasteless cooking fat, lends itself to the achievement of more tasty results in cooking.

Try Crisco in your next batch of cookies and you will know the reason why it is exclusively used by millions of discriminating housewives.

Fruit Cookies

Dainty Things Liked by Both Big and Little People

- 1 cupful Crisco
- 2 cupfuls brown sugar
- 1 teaspoonful salt
- 3 eggs
- 1½ tablespoonfuls baking soda
- 2 tablespoonfuls sour milk
- 1 teaspoonful powdered cinnamon
- ½ teaspoonful powdered allspice
- 1 teaspoonful powdered ginger
- 1 cupful chopped raisins
- 1 cupful chopped English walnut meats
- Flour

(Use level measurements)

Cream Crisco and sugar together, add salt, eggs well beaten, soda mixed with milk, spices, raisins, nuts, and enough flour to make a stiff dough. About five cupfuls of flour will be sufficient. Roll out, cut with cooky cutter, lay on Criscoed tins and bake in moderate oven from ten to twelve minutes. Sufficient for sixty cookies.

You may learn how to make other cookies by sending for "A Calendar of Dinners", a handsome, cloth-bound, gold-stamped, well-illustrated book containing 365 dinner menus, 615 recipes tested by Marion Harris Neil, and the interesting Story of Crisco. Write for it. Address Dept. S-6, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, O., enclosing five two-cent stamps. A paper-bound edition, without the "Calendar of Dinners" but with 250 recipes is sent free.

One family depa d, leaving a table half set for dinne All were crazy to get to the gold mi s and to take part in the prosperity wh n it was thought Skagway would ha After a short while the town was ab doned. All had left with the exceptio of a man named Emil Klatt, who toc up a homestead on the site of the ab doned city. He plowed the streets an aid out his fields among the town lot He farmed there for years and bec ne generally known as the Mayor of ea, although his only subjects were cat and sheep.

I s interesting to hear the Skagway-ıs tell of the days when their town wa n the height of its drunken prosper y. It was, to use a slang phrase, a wic open community, having sixty-one sal ns, each with its dance hall adjoin-ing There were neither courts nor pol e. At that time there was no law in Al a under which a municipal governme could be organized, and the only rep sentative of Uncle Sam was the dep ty marshal. He was a rough charac , and was supposed to be in league wi the criminal element. At least he di othing to control it, and there were ba s of thugs, who held up the tenderfo or, as he is called here, the chee-ch o, and even robbed the old miners as ey came from the Klondike.

Good baskets woven by Alaskan natives little later the criminal element was co ined by one Jefferson Smith, who ha traditional fame here, something lik that of Slade of Mark Twain's "l ughing It." Smith went by the ni ame of Soapy. He got the title fr having peddled soap wrapped in ba notes on the streets of the towns of Colorado. He would pretend to wr up the soap in ten or twenty dollar bil selling it from boxes, which conta d both blanks and prizes, auctioning off the packages. The game is a sw dle, well known throughout the W t.

apy Smith came to Skagway at just ab t the time of the beginning of the wa between our country and Spain. He go together about four hundred of the vi ous element of the place and offe l them to President McKinley as a nd of rough riders, ready to fight th Spaniards. The President, who had be posted as to their character, was ol ged to decline them. Soapy then ar ed and drilled them, and used them, to rey upon the community. They ro ed strangers, singly and in crowds. Th y committed a large number of m ders, and it was almost sure death to oppose them. The people were af id of them, honest men were inti dated and a reign of terror arose ar lasted for months.

apt. Baughman of the Humboldt, th ship in which I came to Skagway, to me the other day how the advance ag its of Soapy's gang would go to Seat-t nd come back with the crowd on his steamer. The crowd consisted of miners, each of whom had an outfit that had cost about $500, and in addition enough money to get him to Dawson. Some had more, some less. It cost a great deal to get the freight over the mountains, and Soapy's agents, who were pretended miners, would organize companies with a view to getting cheap freight, and they would take from each member of the company an order to the ship to release his goods to the packers. Upon landing the men would run the miners into Soapy's gambling saloon, where, within the space of an hour, they were sure to lose all their money at cards. They then had not enough to pay their freight bills and as a result the outfits would fall into the hands of the gang. Captain Baughman told me that it would take only about forty or fifty minutes after the ship came to anchor for the men to land and lose all their money, and come back weeping and beg for a steerage passage home.

I asked Captain Baughman, who knew Soapy Smith, as to what became of his money. The captain replied:

"He spent it as fast as it came, and when he was killed he had nothing to speak of. Soapy gave to the men who were with him, and he was the most charitable man that ever came to Alaska. He paid the expenses of many who went broke, and helped them out of the country. He was free also in his gifts of money, and his orders for provisions to be sent to the poor were such that his trade was worth hundreds of dollars a week to several of the Skagway stores. It was for this reason that some of the citizens said nothing against him. Moreover, every one knew that Soapy's enemies had a strange way of disappearing and being nevermore heard from."

THE Skagway of today is an orderly community. It has good schools, waterworks and sewers, electric lights and telephones, a daily newspaper and several churches. It has a courthouse of its own, and a jail for possible criminals. The chief business of the town seems to be the selling of curios to the tourists. There are a half-dozen stores that sell jewelry, carvings, moccasins and baskets. The jewelry is made by the Indians, being pounded out of silver dollars. The carvings are of walrus tusks cut by the Eskimos, and the moccasins and baskets are manufactured by the natives about Skagway and in other parts of Alaska. None of these things is cheap. The finest baskets, little ones that will not hold more than a quart, bring from $50 to $100. No basket of fine workmanship can be bought for less than $8 or $10. The best are made under water. They are of straw woven finer than the finest panama hat, and so delicate and intricate that it takes several months to make a basket as big as the head of a baby. The very finest come from the Aleutian Islands. They are woven by the older of the Indian women. The art is dying out, and it will probably pass away with this generation.

A Lifetime Car

Built by John W. Bate, the Efficiency Engineer

John W. Bate has given years to the Mitchell with two major objects in view.

One was to create here a model motor car plant. Every building, every machine has been designed to cut factory costs to the minimum.

Now this plant is complete. It covers 45 acres and represents an investment of $5,000,000. It contains 2092 up-to-date machines.

Mr. Bate has reduced our factory costs 50 per cent. Not another plant in the world could build a car of this size and grade for as little as it costs us here.

That is why a car like this—a wonderful example of fine engineering—can be sold at the Mitchell price. And that is how we include 26 costly extras—wanted features which other cars omit.

The 218,000-Mile Car

Then Mr. Bate has stood for a lifetime car. He says that a car, with proper care, should live about as long as its owner.

So he and his experts have taken each part and studied how to combine more than needed strength with the minimum of weight.

They have worked out 700 improvements. They have eliminated nearly all castings. There are 440 parts in this New Mitchell which are either drop-forged or made of tough stamped steel.

They use a wealth of Chrome-Vanadium steel. To vital parts they give twice the needed strength. Yet this New Mitchell—with 127-inch wheelbase—weighs under 3000 pounds.

Please note the results.

One Bate-built Mitchell that we know of has run 218,734 miles. Six Mitchells that we know of have averaged 164,372 miles each—or over 30 years of ordinary service. And the Mitchell of today is a far better car.

Another fact is that expert engineers, when they buy for themselves, are now choosing the Mitchell. Your Mitchell dealer has a long list of them—men famous the country over. All these noted experts—men who know cars best—are now driving a Mitchell Six.

What Women Prize

This year we bring out a Mid-Year model, to combine all the best ideas brought out at the New York Shows. Before its completion our experts examined 257 latest models. And every new touch that proved popular will be found in this beautiful car

In addition, there are 26 extras unique to the Mitchell. Some appeal to women—some to men. These are things, remember, which other cars omit.

Then this is the only car with Bate cantilever springs. You never have known such an easy-riding car. This is a spring which has never broken since the first went out.

Go let your Mitchell dealer show what this car will do.

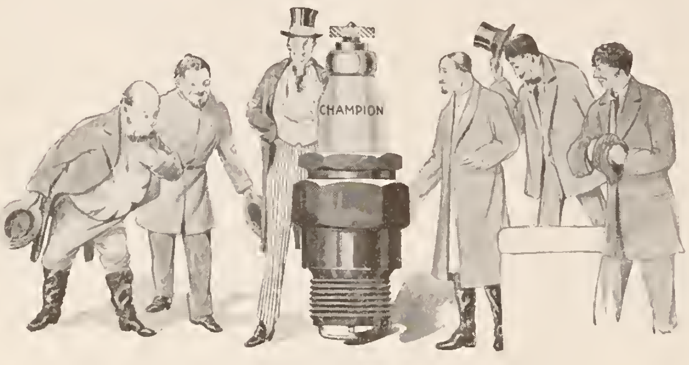
Dependable Spark Plugs



The Over-Seas Tribute to Champion Dependability

Europe comes to America for many articles which Yankee ingenuity produces cheaply.

But when Europe pays America a quality tribute, she does so grudgingly, and only after indisputable proof of exceptional superiority.

Yet leading European spark plug manufacturers buy Champion made porcelain insulators in large quantities for their quality plugs.

And in addition to European importations of our porcelains, the discriminating European trade demands over six hundred thousand complete Champion Dependable Spark Plugs annually—more than two thousand every work day in the year

At home, four out of five of the cars built this year are being equipped with Champions.

No single indispensable item of motor car construction is so universally specified as exclusive equipment.

You buy no other accessory for your car with such a clear and conclusive international quality tribute to guide your selection.

Remember this when you have occasion to replace the plugs in your car and specify Champions.

Your dealer will tell you which one is designed especially to serve your particular make of motor.

Concerning Brides

In Which the Bride of Fifty Years Ago and the Bride of Today Discuss Wedding Customs

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE two brides sat together, the little pink and white and gold Bride of Today and the silver-haired Bride of Fifty Years Ago. They sat in deep-cushioned wicker chairs under the apple tree, and the sunlight slanting through the leaves touched their hair with tenderly loving fingers. The little Bride of Fifty Years Ago smiled at the Bride of Today, and spoke.

"Your hair is like the sunlight itself," said she.

"And yours is like moonlight—June moonlight, grandmother!" said the Bride of Today.

I sat on a fluffy cushion at their feet, and looked up, absorbed in the picture they made. A wonderful picture—the picture of youth and age—the picture of Springtime and Autumn.

"I suppose," I questioned, "that you are planning your weddings?"

"We are indeed," answered the Bride of Today, "my wedding and grandmother's—golden wedding."

The Bride of Fifty Years Ago nodded reflectively. "It doesn't seem," she told us, "as if I could have a golden wedding. It doesn't seem as if I have been married fifty years. Why, I remember just as plain as if it were yesterday, how I got together my linen, piece by piece, and embroidered it and hemstitched it and laid it away in lavender. It seemed as if I couldn't get enough for that new home of mine. I had two chests full when my wedding day came around."

The Bride of Today nodded sympathetically. "I know just how you felt," she murmured, "just how you felt. Why, I've embroidered everything myself. It didn't seem as if other hands ought to touch it!"

"My wedding was very simple," said the other; "we drove to the little church that my girl friends had decorated with daisies and roses and sweet clover. They had ropes of the daisies tied from the end of one pew to the next, all the way from the door to the altar, and they had made an arch of rambler roses for us to walk under. It looked mighty sweet!" smiled the little Bride of Fifty Years Ago.

"Our church is small, too," said the other bride. "It's going to be all decorated in roses, though, we have so many of them. Bob"—the Bride of Today colored faintly, "Bob says that roses seem to suit me better than anything else. We're going to have pale pink roses, a great loose bouquet of them on the end of each pew, and we're going to have tall green vases of them in the dusky corners and great masses of them banked against the altar. Our florist is making a huge bell of white and pink flowers. That is going to hang from the chandelier in the center of the church. Perhaps—perhaps, if you don't mind, we'll have an arch to stand under like you did——"

THE Bride of Fifty Years Ago was evidently not listening. She seemed wrapped up in her own thoughts, for when she spoke she did not answer her granddaughter's question. "My wedding dress," she told us softly, "was made out of white satin. It had a hoop skirt, and I remember how it rustled as I walked down the aisle. I wore a long veil that had been my grandmother's (it went to pieces years ago), a long veil with orange blossoms, and I carried a bouquet of round little white rosebuds in a white lace paper holder."

The Bride of Today looked wistful. "I can't afford anything very wonderful for my wedding clothes," said she. "I'd rather put all of my money that I can, into my home, but," she added with a toss of her head, "I'm going to look nice. My dress is white taffeta, and it's wired around the edge so that it looks almost like a hoop skirt too, and my veil is made out of white tulle. White tulle is as pretty and not nearly as expensive as lace. I don't know what my bouquet will be—he'll get that for me, but I think that will be a shower bouquet of roses and alle lilies," said the Bride of Today.

"But what about the other wedding," I questioned from the cushion at their feet; "what about the golden wedding?"

The Bride of Fifty Years Ago laughed softly, half under her breath. "Why, the golden wedding is going to be very wonderful too," she told us. "We're going to have all yellow flowers for the decorations and big yellow ribbon bows. We're going to have buttercups and marigolds, and I'm going to carry a little round bouquet of yellow roses in a lace paper holder—just as I carried white roses fifty years ago. I'm going to wear a silver-gray dress with real lace collar and cuffs.

"The refreshments are going to be gold and white too. I'm going to have sunshine cake, and lemonade, and tiny sandwiches with rich yellow mayonnaise. I'm going to have yellow candies and cookies iced with yellow icing, and a bride cake with orange blossoms on it. . . ."

The Bride of Today interrupted. "Speaking of bride cakes," she said, "I'm going to have one, too; a tall one iced in white, with a bell in sugar on the top of it. And in the cake I'm going to have a ring and a thimble. The one who gets the ring will be the next one married, the one who gets the thimble will be an old maid or a bachelor. I'm going to cut the cake myself, and while they are eating it I'm going to slip out of the room and change my gown and meet Bob at the foot of the stairs and we'll run away."

"When I went on my wedding trip," said the Bride of Fifty Years Ago, "I wore a little dark blue silk dress and a heavy red and blue East India shawl. I had a tiny tight blue bonnet on my head with small red poppies around the crown——"

The Bride of Today smiled. "I'm wearing a little blue serge traveling suit," she said, "with white piqué collar and cuffs. White piqué collar and cuffs are so nice for traveling, and I'm wearing a little blue straw hat with white roses around the crown and a bit of white ribbon."

"Where," I questioned, "are you going on your wedding trip?"

The Bride of Today laughed.

"That's a secret!" she told me.

BUT the Bride of Fifty Years Ago was looking off into the distance, and I knew that her mind was far away in the golden land of memory. The sunlight touched her hair, faintly, with a hint of glory.

"A Gospel to Every Soldier!"

THE Waldensian Church in America has fully realized the new opportunities for Christian work, due to the fact that no less than three million soldiers massed in a comparatively small territory are ready to receive the message of the Gospel. The Italian government has nominated three Waldensian pastors as chaplains in the army with the rank of captain. They hold regular services in the trenches whenever possible, visit the wounded in the infirmaries and hospitals, and comfort the dying. No other denomination has had this privilege. A committee of assistance and relief for the Italian evangelical soldiers has been organized in Turin, with the object of keeping in touch with all the Protestant soldiers, and with those who want their ministrations. Every soldier is supplied with a New Testament, a comfort bag, and, where possible, woolen clothing. Relief is also given to the families of reservists. Colporteurs of the Immigration Bureau of our Society met the Italian reservists who poured into Genoa and Naples from America and other ports of the world, selling and distributing copies of the Gospel among them. All the Waldensian churches throughout Italy and Sicily cooperate in this work by trying to reach the soldiers in the local barracks or by sending relief to the committee in Turin. The motto of the church this year is "A Gospel to Every Soldier!"

The Latest and Largest Eight

Size means more than measurement — it means greater merit—many more advantages.

The Cole Eight is the largest eight cylinder automobile in the world.

The performance of the Cole seventy-horse power motor is almost miraculous.

Quick as a flash, it silently and swiftly slips from a standstill to sixty miles an hour!

Faster? It will go faster than you will ever dare travel. You'll probably never use half the power always at your command. But it's there for the pinch!

That's probably the reason we have never been able to catch up with orders.

Isn't that the car you want? It's all in the Cole Eight.

The Philippian Jailer

International Sunday School Lesson for June 18. Acts 16:

Gains and Salvation

By Arthur H. Howland

THE business of making money out of other people is one of the most serious problems that society has to face. Some students and teachers of the science of sociology hold that it is always fundamentally wrong for one person to make a profit out of the labor of another, holding that each person should have the right to all the proceeds of his own work. There are many grades of opinion and belief and practice all the way from the extreme position just stated to that of the man, recognized as the lowest and vilest type of humanity, who will take profits from the shame of women whose lives and conduct he controls. Here at Philippi long ago was a young girl who brought her masters much gain by "soothsaying." She was a fortune-teller, and in some way or other had persuaded the people that she could give them valuable information, not otherwise available, and they paid money for this information. Notice, however, that the money went to the masters and not to the girl.

When she saw Paul and Silas, Luke and Timothy, she knew that there was something in their true and positive, though mysterious, knowledge and experience of divine things which was altogether different from her spurious and fraudulent claims and work. There must have been true nobility in her soul, for when she saw the true thing, she admired it and cried out bravely: "These men are the servants of the most high God, and show unto us the way of salvation."

The disciples at first paid no attention, and for several days she followed them, uttering these strange cries. Paul was moved to pity by the sight of this young life which was being so spoiled and humiliated. He spoke to her bravely in the name of Jesus, and a marvelous change came over her. Her soul yielded itself to the power of Christ, and her pretensions to magic power fell away.

THEN the trouble began: "Her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone." The test of the pocketbook was the severest test of all in those days as it is in this. We shall see in our study of the apostles' work at Ephesus, described in the 19th chapter, the working of this same spirit, the spirit of greed. "By this craft we have our wealth," moaned Demetrius as he complained of Paul's preaching of the true God, by which people were being turned from the worship of Diana. It is easy to get people to rally for the protection of profits even when it means the imprisoning or the killing of the prophets who would interfere with them. In fact, it is a rallying for the defense of profits that has led to most of the wars of the world. Anything else can be tolerated rather than to have the "hope of gain" destroyed.

So the masters of this poor girl and her friends had Paul and Silas arrested and brought into court. "These men, being Jews, do excedingly trouble our city." This was the charge. And the specifications were that they taught customs which were not lawful for the people of the Roman empire to receive and observe.

Paul said nothing at this time about the fact of his Roman citizenship, which would have saved him a beating. He took the cruel punishment—many, probably thirty-nine, blows from a heavy leather whip upon his bare back—and then went, smiling and bleeding, into the prison.

These were strange circumstances in which to be singing, but at midnight, in the inner prison, their feet fast in the stocks, their backs sore and bleeding, "Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises to God."

Then came the earthquake, the sudden releasing of their bonds, and the cry of the jailer in the midst of the darkness and confusion, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" Earthquake we common in that region, and s an earthquake could well loose and shatter the fastenings of door and chains. Something very like t oc curred in St. Louis in 1896 wh the great cyclone, which destroyed eral million dollars' worth of prope in that city and took a toll of four h dred lives, blew out a large section of t wal of the city jail, leaving the i erior exposed. It was the hour for e eise, and the prisoners were assemble out side their cells, but they we too frightened by the terrible tum of nature to try to escape.

WHAT did the Philippian ile mean when he asked h ho might be saved? What sort of lva tion was he thinking of? The or "save" and "salvation" had rdl become common yet in the thoug an speech of the world. Indeed the Christian believers themselves ere probably just learning them. The slave girl had used the word in h wild cries after the apostles: "These nen show us the way of salvation." Now here is the jailer, asking to hav this way pointed out to him. Of rse, terrified by the earthquake, h was thinking of being saved from dily harm; and he had strong reas for desperate fears that his life mig be taken by the government as a fei for the lives of the prisoners com ted to his care. This was the law the Roman empire. But there is ery reason to believe that there wer still deeper fears in his soul. He ha perhaps heard Paul and Silas preach the city. He had seen their strang and joyous calm when they were arr ed. He had perhaps heard them sing as he had made his last rounds of the rison. And now the terror of the th-quake had filled his soul with a at the thought of eternity. He th ght of sin as never before; he realized ha he was a sinner. And with these t ors in his soul he cried out: "What n t I do to be saved?"

This is a question that the he of mankind is always asking. And au gave the only answer that has ver satisfied: "Believe on the Lord sus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

Can this old-fashioned answ to this old-fashioned question be rep ed and defended in terms that satsif the acute thinking and strong feelin of the present day? Is this still th one only sure way to be saved, to be eternally saved—to believe in Jesus? an we make the busy, shrewd man t day believe that, and understa it. and accept it?

What does it mean to believe o he Lord Jesus Christ?

WE do not know to what e nt Paul defined and expanded ese words in his further talk with the ler and his family, but we do know at often these words in themselves, th little or no explanation, have le to prompt blessing and emancipatio I once heard Bishop Fowler tell of l ng called to the bedside of a dying m a victim of the plague of cholera. he man asked one question: "How c l be saved?" There was time for ly the briefest answer. So the bi op quoted these words of Paul to he Philippian jailer, and the soul of he dying man was filled with light.

But as we analyze these word ve can see how it is that they have ch power to bring about the delive ce of the human soul from its wrongs nd its fears.

To believe in Jesus Christ m ns first of all to believe that God is l d. One of the saddest elements of pa n-ism is that it is so full of fear. T se people, not knowing the true God nd seeing only the strange harshnes of nature and the hardness of life, t ik that God is hateful and cruel. J is came to say and to demonstrate nd prove that God is kind. And to believe in him means to believe that.

Then, to believe on the Lord J us

t means or produces a change in ian's inner life. The spectacle of t or the story of Christ shows a the evil of his heart and the evil ; ways. In some sure and subtle on he connects this evil with his and as he recognizes the infinite of Christ he accepts the fact that power will change him from a bad to a good man.

ther, to believe on the Lord Jesus t means to accept his principles is ways. It is one of the most sting curiosities of language study n Greek the words "believe" and ;" come from the same root. d, one derivative word occurring rious forms several times in the Testament is used interchangeably believe" and "obey." We cannot eally believe on Jesus without ng him; and we cannot obey him ut believing him. So our faith go the whole way of taking his for our spirit, his plans for our his ways for our ways.

TE twentieth century shows no urer, sweeter, stronger, kinder, holier way of life than that taught Peasant of Galilee in the midst wild paganism and harsh cruelf the Roman Empire. People re longing now to be kind and l and safe hail the true preachers rist today as the slave-girl of Phileeted Paul and Silas centuries ago: e men are the servants of the high God and show unto us the f salvation." And those who are of sin and tired of failure and tired certainty about the future find ords perpetually true. "Believe e Lord Jesus Christ, and thou e saved."

that is not only the way of lual salvation; it is the way of salvation. Europe is going to because it would not follow Jesus. fessed to believe in him, but it t understand that belief means nce. That civilization is doomed ish which is not built upon the f Christ. How true do the words rist sound in the midst of the din rope's catastrophe: "Everyone heareth these sayings of mine, oeth them not, shall be likened foolish man, who built his house he sand. And the rain descended, he floods came, and the winds and beat upon that house; and it d great was the fall of it."

he jailer and his family and the e-telling slave-girl were added to tle company of Philippian Christ a church that developed a sweet nerous and self-sacrificing chars years went on. We like to think slave-girl in the home of Lydia, friend and patroness, to whose he and his companion had been welcome, and where they red from their wounds before ding on their way. Jesus had this young soul to a life of peace uietness and gentleness and hope. ins of her former masters had been l, but the church of Philippi and Christian history had become en by her salvation, while the jailer out as the man who voiced the eatest question of the human race ho received in its simplest form ernal answer.

he Worth of Fidelity

A Thought for Boys

TH lesson of the Philippian jailer has eral good lessons for boys. First the of the sorceress bared the duplicity rice of her masters. Paul saw someat was dead wrong, and he used all the he had to overthrow the wrong. In ays boys will be tempted to tolerate esentation. They will be told that certle deceits are necessary to profitable s and that they hurt no one; they will at rottenness and politics are insepand that party success depends upon degrees of blindness on specified is. The world needs boys who, as ll nail both these falsehoods and stand are for simple truth and honesty. The g mob and the beating and the imient will teach boys to expect hardship ervice of the right. Evil men will not uished without fighting back Things always go well. The fellow worth the fellow who can whistle when everygoing against him, and who can smile, y wholesome smile, when every pros a disappointment. Paul and Silas were not grouchy in prison. They did not sulk because they had been unjustly treated and illegally jailed. They sang Psalms and prayed and praised God, and their deliverance proves the certainty that wrong can never triumph over the man who stands unswervingly and cheerfully for the right. The conversion of the jailer and his house was the beginning of new triumphs for the new faith in Philippi. Then, to round it out, the unjust magistrates, finding they had beaten and imprisoned a Roman citizen uncondemned, were brought as suppliants to the man they had mistreated. Here is another peg for a boy's attention. It is sometimes best to stand up for your rights and to demand full justice.

Perhaps Not So Bad

A Thought for Girls

"THEN he called for a light. . . ." The Philippian jailer in the lesson text thought that Paul and Silas were bad men—else why had they been thrown into his prison? People thrown into prisons usually are bad, very bad indeed. So the jailer, without trying to find out for himself, thrust them into a damp inner cell and placed their feet in stocks. And then, while they prayed and sang hymns, the jailer slept and thought that he had done his task well.

It's very easy to take things on the valuation of other folk. It's very easy to believe that certain things are good or bad—just as the jailer believed that Paul and Silas were bad—because one is assured of it by some superior person who is supposed to know the facts. It's very much more difficult to take the time to get down under the surface and really find out things for oneself. The Philippian jailer didn't have time. He had to get some sleep.

Very often we too feel that we need to sleep when we might be finding out something valuable about our fellow men. Very often we would rather sit back comfortably and let other folk do our thinking for us. But we forget that there will come a time of awakening.

The Philippian jailer was sleeping so soundly that it took an earthquake to awaken him. But when he was awakened he realized that Paul and Silas were good men despite appearances, and he fell down on his knees before them and called for a light.

Pay attention to the people around you, and form your own opinions. Because your best chum tells you that Mary Jones is not a nice girl, it does not signify that Mary Jones is impossible. Find out for yourself. Mary Jones may be a very wonderful person under her commonplace exterior. She may have marvelous thoughts in her brain. Don't wait for a thunder storm or a miracle to wake you. Be so wide awake to the good qualities of people that you will be able to recognize their worth even if you see them under trying circumstances.

EVIDENCE of the Christian unity that prevails on foreign mission fields is found in an appeal from Congregationalist missionaries in India. Near the Madura mission of the American Board in South India is a mission of the German Lutheran Church. During the first months of the war these missionaries were not disturbed, but because of various intrigues and conspiracies charged against German civilians in India, all Germans were at last interned and the missionaries were dragged away to a prison camp. Their work was maintained "by the sacrificial gifts of missionaries of other boards in India, who have made contributions out of their small incomes," according to the Congregationalist, which publishes an appeal to the local Congregational churches for gifts to maintain this German Lutheran work.

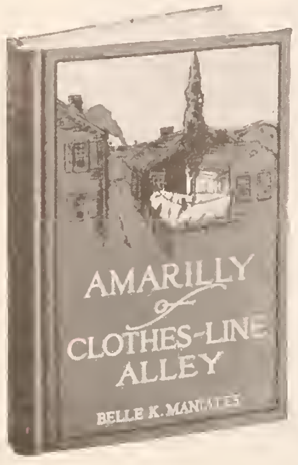
CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS WILL ENJOY THESE BOOKS

"AMARILLY"
IN BOOK FORM



We have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the Boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story. In the human appeal, sweet humor, and genuine cheeriness between its covers, there will await you many laughs; and a tear or two as well.

We will send "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," attractively bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $2.00.
Or, we will send "Amarilly" to old subscribers as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' sub-. scription to the Christian Herald with $1.00.

"JUST DAVID"
By ELEANOR H. PORTER
Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.
"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm.
David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David" as a reward to old subscribers for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by $1.00.
Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.00.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified evel.
"Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of the golden age in our own time. That beautiful season that makes life radiant while it lasts.
It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely hound in cloth, will be sent, postpaid, with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2.00.
Or, we will send to old subscribers, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Fixing the Price

THERE is pending in Congress a bill known as the Stephens-Ashurst Bill, designed to protect the public against dishonest advertisers and false pretenses in merchandising. The bill makes it legal for the grower, producer, manufacturer or owner of an article of commerce sold under trade mark or special brand to prescribe the uniform prices at which the different qualities and quantities may be resold, subject to the condition that such vendor shall not have any monopoly of the market for the article sold, nor be a party to any combination or understanding with competitors for the creation of a closed market. The bill also requires that complete information shall be on file with the Federal Trade Commission. This bill is being vigorously opposed by the mail-order interests and by the great department stores. It is being as vigorously supported by the great national advertisers, whose business is now being assailed by trade practices which it is the purpose of the bill to correct.

The average man is a consumer, and facing as he does constantly increasing costs of living, is prone to welcome as a friend in need the merchant who cuts the price. There is a feeling that somewhere along the line there is a tremendous profit, and that the price-cutter is only sharing his profit with the consumer to the shame of his competitors.

It costs the average merchant from 12 to 16 per cent. on his total year's business to pay freights, to display and insure his goods, to sell them and to deliver them. A great many staple items yield him little more than 10 per cent. gross profit above cost and freight. Other articles yield him 25 per cent., 33⅓ per cent., 50 per cent., sometimes 100 per cent. profit, but the higher-profit goods are slower of sale, and altogether he does well to net 4 or 5 per cent. on his year's business.

FORTY years ago beans were beans, and oatmeal was oatmeal, and calico was calico, and the manufacturer had only to quote the price that coincided with the market, or a slightly lower price, to insure the selling of his product. Even at that time, certain manufacturers had attained a preeminence in the trade through the acknowledged superiority of their product, and Indian-head muslin and Naumkeag gingham commanded markets of their own. Gradually manufacturers came to produce certain definite grades of goods under distinctive brands and finally they began to advertise these brands in magazines of national circulation in order that the consumer might be acquainted with their merchandise and encouraged to ask for it. In order to hold the friendship of the consumer which might be gained through this advertising, these manufacturers were compelled to produce an article a little better than similar articles with which it was in competition, for if the consumer, following the urge of the ad, bought the article once and found it no better than some articles not advertised, the advertisement would have registered a failure rather than a success.

Similarly, the national advertiser was forced to a more efficient system of merchandising his product, and the result was a lower price coupled with a higher quality. Now quality and price often stand together in the consumer's thought of an article. He learns to value a certain commodity and believes it to be worth its price. Then a cut price is advertised, and instantly suggests to him a lowering of the value. He thinks the article is stale or shop-worn or has been displaced by a newer thing of the same kind of which he has not yet heard, and so he can now purchase it under its former price. And experience proves that it is almost impossible to remove this false idea of the changed value of the article. It requires but a moment's thought to realize how great is the harm to the manufacturer when such an effect is widely produced, as, for example, by the cutting of the price of a well-known article in a chain of department ores. Thus, in buying at the cut pri the public unconsciously is under ning the prestige and even the very rmanency of a manufacturer's good ame It is essential, therefore, to th nanufacturer that he should be a e to control the price at which his go s are marketed, otherwise he loses the hole effect of his campaign, and is w e off than his non-advertising com titor by the amount of profit which has sacrificed to the giving of greater alue. The price-cutter insists that by tting the price he increases the sales the article. But the experience of th nanufacturers has been to the contra .

THE larger department stor and the mail-order houses who the most of this price-cutting, face a uch higher cost of doing business th the average local merchant. In m department stores the cost of doin business exceeds 25 per cent. of th total sales, and the cost of mercha ising by mail cannot be much less. hese stores sometimes cut the price of oods whose value has been fixed in the ublic mind by the manufacturers' lvertising below the actual cost to hemselves. Their stock is not ma up however, exclusively of this icle, and little of their merchandise ll be found bearing standard label the favorite label being "Our Own ke," or "Made Expressly for ——," abe which is frequently found on g ls of inferior workmanship or of a alue slightly less than that protect by brands with which the public is fa liar. The prices on this merchandise, em ingly low, are really as high as th tore dares to charge for the quality presented. The profit in such g s is much wider than upon advertise ood when marketed at the advertise rice. Some well-known article is adv ised widely by the store at prices m below the standard, and the pu c is thereby led to flock to the store. ome of the article upon which the pr has been cut is sold, but with it a sold large quantities of other goods at rices which net the store a very satis tory profit, which probably do not heat the purchaser, but which do n save him any money. At the same ti the value of the advertised article upon which the price has been cut, is l ened in the mind of every person w has bought it at the cut prices.

There are so many lines of m handise about which it is impossi for the buying public to have full owledge, that the objectionable of advertised articles as bait for t sale of inferior goods can only be pre nted by giving the manufacturer the ower to control the selling price of his ods.

THE consumer has more at s e in national advertising than w d at first appear. National advertisi has been the St. Patrick of business. has driven misrepresentation, careless workmanship, and shoddy merchandis back into the shadows of the rear roo It has put business on a new four uare basis of truth in merchandise, i business relations, and in publicity National advertising has stand ized merchandise and has forced new standards of quality which, but for it ould not have been possible except at uch higher prices under the blind s tems of distribution which formerly iled The breakfast table of almos any American home of today is el uent testimony to the influence of n onal advertising. The hats we wea the hose we endeavor to wear out, and early every article of human use will b ound bearing the stamp or imprint of advertiser of national repute.

The national advertiser has m le possible for the consumer to kno what he is buying, and to be sure that n he buys he will get the quality that he pects. The passage of the Stephens- urst Bill will prevent the undermin g of the honest manufacturer by m hods that are at least open to questic and will assure to the consumer a ntinuance of fair and dependable m handising under the white light of ilespublicity.

pr st of this Government on Jan. 4, 1916. Bu o that protest the memorandum under ac wledgment makes no reference and is nt ly unresponsive.

e Government of the United States must ag insist with emphasis that the British an rench Governments do not obtain rightful risdiction of ships by forcing or inducing the to visit their ports for the purpose of sei g their mails, or thereby obtain greater bel erent rights as to such ship than they cou exercise on the high seas, for there is, in opinion of the Government of the United Sta , no legal distinction between the seizure of ils at sea, which is announced as abando , and their seizure from vessels voluntar or involuntarily in port.

British and French practice amounts to unwarranted limitation on the use by ne als of the world's highway for the transmi on of correspondence. The practice act lly followed by the Allied Powers must be id to justify the conclusion, therefore, tha he announcement of Feb. 15 was merely not that one illegal practice had been abando to make place for the development of anc er more onerous and vexatious in charact

e present practice is a violation not only of spirit of the announcement of Feb. 15 but f the rule of The Hague Convention up which it is concededly based. Aside fro this it is a violation of the prior practice of ions which Great Britain and her allies ha n the past insisted to establish and maintai notwithstanding the statement in the me randum "that as late as 1907 the letters an ispatches themselves could be seized an onfiscated."

ring the war between the United States an lexico the United States forces allowed Bri h steamers to enter and depart from the por f Vera Cruz without molesting the mails int led for inland points. During the Americ ivil war Lord Russell endeavored to ind the United States to concede that "her Ma ty's mails on board a private vessel sho be exempted from visitation or deten n." This exemption of mails was urged in ober, 1862, in the case of British mails on ard the Adela. On Oct. 31 Secretary Sew d announced that "public mails of any frie ly or neutral power duly certified or au nticated as such shall not be searched or op d, but be put as speedily as may be conven t on the way to their designated destinatio In accordance with this announcement the overnment of the United States in the cas f the British steamship Peterhoff, which ha een seized with her mails against the pro t, of her Majesty's Government, had her ails forwarded to destination unopened.

T same rule was followed by France, as I a advised, in the Franco-Prussian war of 187 by the United States in the Spanish-Am can war of 1898; by Great Britain in the uth African war, in the case of the German mail steamers Bundesrath and General; by pan, and substantially by Russia, in the Ru -Japanese war of 1904. And even in the esent war, as the memorandum of Great Bri n and France states, their enemy, Ger ny, has desisted from the practice of int ring with neutral mails, even on board bell rent steamers. This is illustrated by the se of the French steamer Floride, captur by the auxiliary cruiser Prinz Eitel Fri ich, cited by the British and French Go nments in support of their argument reg ling parcel mails. In this case the letter mai of the Floride, amounting to 144 sacks, wer forwarded to their destination by the con ander at the first opportunity upon arrivi in the United States. It would seem, the ore, to be conclusively established that the nterferences with mails of which this Go nment justly complains are wrong in pri ple and in practice.

T arbitrary methods employed by the Bri n and French Governments have resulted mos disastrously to citizens of the United Sta . Important papers which can never be plicated, or can be duplicated only with gre difficulty, such as United States patents for ventions, rare documents, legal papers rela g to the settlement of estates, powers of orney, fire insurance claims, income tax retu s, and similar matters, have been lost.

ays in receiving shipping documents hav aused great loss and inconvenience by pre nting prompt delivery of goods.

I the case of the Macniff Horticultural Co any of New York large shipments of pla and bulbs from Holland were, I am infor d, frozen on the wharves because posses could not be obtained in the absence of uments relating to them which had been rem ed from the Nieuw Amsterdam, Coster , and Rotterdam.

iness opportunities are lost by failure to nsmit promptly bids, specifications, and con cts.

Standard Underground Cable Company of tsburgh, for example, sent by mail a ten and specifications for certain proposed ele cal works to be constructed in Christia ; after several weeks of waiting the pap have failed to arrive. The American com ny was told that the bids could not be lon held open and the contract was awarded to ritish competitor.

Checks, drafts, money orders, securities, and similar property are lost or detained for weeks and months.

Business correspondence relating to legitimate and bona fide trade between neutral countries, correspondence of a personal nature, and also certain official correspondence, such as money order lists and other matter forwarded by Government departments, are detained, lost, or possibly destroyed. For instance, the Postmaster General informs me that certain international money order lists from the United States to Germany, Greece, and other countries, and from Germany to the United States, sent through the mails, have not reached their destination, though dispatched several months ago. It was necessary to have some of these lists duplicated and again dispatched by the steamship Frederick VIII., which sailed from New York on April 19, and from which all the mails intended for Germany have been taken and held in British jurisdiction.

As a further example of the delay and loss consequent upon the British practice, the Postmaster General also sends me a copy of a letter from the British Postal Administration admitting that the mails were removed from the steamer Medan in the Downs on Jan. 30 last and not forwarded until some time "between the 2d of February and the 2d of March," and that 182 bags of these mails "were lost during transmission to Holland on the 26th day of February by the Dutch steamship Mecklenburg." The Medan arrived safely at Rotterdam a day or two after she left the Downs.

Numerous complaints similar to the foregoing have been received by this Government, the details of which are available, but I believe I have cited sufficient facts to show the unprecedented and vexatious nature of the interference with mails persisted in by British and French authorities.

Not only are American commercial interests injured, but rights of property are violated, and the rules of international law and custom are palpably disregarded. I can only add that this continuing offense has led to such losses to American citizens and to a possible responsibility of the United States to repair them that this Government will be compelled in the near future to press claims for full reclamation upon the attention of his Majesty's Government and that of the French Republic.

The principle being plain and definite, and the present practice of the Governments of Great Britain and France being clearly in contravention of the principle, I will state more in detail the position of the Government of the United States in regard to the treatment of certain classes of sealed mails under a strict application of the principle upon which our Governments seem to be in general accord.

The Government of the United States is inclined to the opinion that the class of mail matter which includes stocks, bonds, coupons, and similar securities is to be regarded as of the same nature as merchandise or other articles of property and subject to the same exercise of belligerent rights. Money orders, checks, drafts notes, and other negotiable instruments which may pass as the equivalent of money are, it is considered, also to be classed as merchandise. Correspondence, including shipping documents, money order lists, and papers of that character, even though relating to "enemy supplies or exports," unless carried on the same ship as the property referred to, are, in the opinion of this Government, to be regarded as "genuine correspondence," and entitled to unmolested passage.

The Government of the United States, in view of the improper methods employed by the British and French authorities in interrupting mails passing between the United States and other neutral countries and between the United States and the enemies of Great Britain, can no longer tolerate the wrongs which citizens of the United States have suffered and continue to suffer through these methods. To submit to a lawless practice of this character would open the door to repeated violations of international law by the belligerent powers on the ground of military necessity of which the violator would be the sole judge. Manifestly a neutral nation cannot permit its rights on the high seas to be determined by belligerents or the exercise of those rights to be permitted or denied arbitrarily by the Government of a warring nation. The rights of neutrals are as sacred as the rights of belligerents and must be as strictly observed.

The Government of the United States, confident in the regard for international law and the rights of neutrals which the British and French Governments have so often proclaimed and the disregard of which they have urged so vigorously against their enemies in the present war, expects the present practice of the British and French authorities in the treatment of mails from or to the United States to cease, and belligerent rights, as exercised, to conform to the principle governing the passage of mail matter and to the recognized practice of nations. Only a radical change in the present British and French policy, restoring to the United States its full rights as a neutral power, will satisfy this Government.

I have, &c., ROBERT LANSING.

Henry M. Stanley went Thirty weeks without a Shave

ADOLPH TREIDLER

WHEN Stanley found Dr. Livingston in the heart of the African jungle, one of his first acts was to borrow the hone used by the doctor on his surgical instruments.

Stanley's bearers had lost the baggage containing his hone. His razor had acquired an edge like a butter knife and his beard the appearance of a hedge.

Today practically every famous traveler, explorer and missionary carries a Gillette Safety Razor.

Gillette Blades are on sale in the Arctic Circle and the African Jungle, in every outfitting camp in the world.

Stropping and honing has had its day.

The daily Gillette shave is a matter of course with the average business and professional man.

A Gillette shave is quick and cool, safe and sanitary. It is velvet-smooth, no matter how wiry the beard or tender the skin. Adjust the handle for a light or a close shave. A keen, fresh blade is always ready. No stropping—no honing. Price $5 to $50. Blades 50c. to $1 the packet. Dealers everywhere.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

GLAD reports of glorious revivals come from various quarters. Mrs. W. O. B., writes from Monroe, Wis.: "Some time ago I wrote asking the Prayer League to pray that the revival meetings to be held here might be a great success, and I want to say that God answered our prayer. About two hundred and fifty professed Christ." A believer in prayer writes from Louisiana: "God is most graciously and wonderfully answering your prayers for a revival of religion in this parish. Also the other requests I sent you." G. M. H. writes from Gypsum, Kans.: "We had a very successful meeting. It was considered the best one Gypsum ever had. My mother was converted during this meeting." This friend wishes repeated prayers for her father's conversion and asks prayer for the restoration of her mother's health."

Mrs. C. A. B. writes from Spruce, Mo.: "On January 13th I requested the Prayer League to pray that a young man, licensed to preach, might secure a small charge or mission. I am glad to say God answered this prayer." P. K. S. of Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "Some ten weeks or so ago I requested your prayers in behalf of my wife, and the good Lord heard the prayers of his saints. She has recovered in body and mind and is doing nicely during the last seven weeks without any breakdown. So I am very grateful to the Lord and also to the praying members of the League."

A widowed mother writes from Belleville, N. J.:

> I often had read in your valuable paper answered prayers, in fact I have two important ones cut out of Herald and pasted in my Bible. So I pray that I may be among the answered ones too. My son has been away from home some time and I do not know where he is now. He went to Cleveland, Ohio, but I can't tell if he is there or somewhere else as he has not written to me. I am getting along in years and need his company. He was left fatherless at the age of sixteen months and seems to have forgotten how I cared for him and struggled to bring him up right. I lost a boy seven years old but I know that he is safe—but the other one I pray for all the time that he may become a Christian and write to me speedily."

This sorrowful letter comes from a little girl in Toledo, Ohio:

> I am writing to ask you to pray for my papa, who was once a good man. He never smoked, chewed or drank. But in the last few years he has turned my mamma, my sister and me, down for some other woman. He has caused my mamma lots of sickness and worry, and has left her with a store and lots of debts to pay. I have to be taken out of school. I ask you to pray that he may come back to his family and be a good man again as he was before.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from:

W., Scranton, Pa.; Mrs. E. D., Calgary, Alta., Can.; M. E. B., Monmouth, Iowa; Mrs. W. O. B., Monroe, Wis.; F. T. L., Merrimacport, Mass.; P. K. S., Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. N. J., Presho, S. D.; A Reader, Leeds, N. Y.; Mrs. L. F. J., Comanche, Okla.; A member of the League, California; H. Y., San Jose, Cal.; Mrs. H. O. B., Parsons Kans.; Mrs. E. M. H., Kinston, N. C.; Mrs. L. A. V., Belleville, N. J.; L. G., Ashland, Va.; Miss T. R.; G. M. H., Gypsum, Kans.; Mrs. E. A. B., Dover, Minn.; A believer in prayer, Louisiana; Mrs. L., Union Hill, N. J.

Special prayers are asked for the work of the Gospel Committee for Work Among War Prisoners. Pastor Horn writes from Ebling: "I spoke to the Russians through a good interpreter. The men were deeply touched. Now they are begging for Bibles. Can you send them to us? The men are waiting for them." Evangelist Radnitsky writes: "The prisoners, including Russians, Poles, Letts, Esthonians and even Finns, beg us for tracts and those who could not get any were sadly cast down. In a moment we were surrounded by hundreds of men, all reaching out their hands for tracts. As soon as the Russians heard the words in their own language, tears were seen glistening in the eyes of many." The Committee writes "This work can be done only during the time of war. If we miss this present opportunity it may never return. The long neglected evangelization of Russia depends tremendously upon the immediate action of the American Christians."

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

San Antonio, Texas; Karnak, Ill.; Fort Payne, Ala.; Ord Bend, Cal.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Allensville, Ohio; Knoxville, Tenn.; Coal Harbor, N. D.; Opelika, Ala.; Wateree, S. C. (that many may be saved during revival at the Mount Olive Baptist Church); Betayres, Pa. (that Sunday school pupils may be converted); Bangor, Mich. (that minister may be successful in building up the church); Preston, Neb.; Fremont, Utica and Lewiston, Minn. (in the Presbyterian churches); Piedmont, W. Va. (that immoral houses in this town may be removed and sanitary conditions improved); Nandurbar, Khandesh, India (for the new converts, also for a great revival); Pocahontas, Tenn. (that Sunday school may flourish spiritually, and for the conversion of twenty-five families); Eaton, Colo. (prayers are asked for Billy Sunday in his seven weeks' campaign against the devil and the whisky forces in Kansas City, Mo.); Bow Island, Alta., Canada.

Hubert, N. C.; Shelbyville, Mo.; Waldron, Ark.; Woodbridge, N. J.; Columbia, Mo.; Memphis, Tenn. (in the Tenn. mountains); Calgary, Alta., Can.; Kremlin, Mont. (for a revival at Spring Coulee Schoolhouse in June); Davidson, Mich. (that we may all work together for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom); Excelsior, Minn. (that God will open doors for Union Evangelistic Campaigns for an Evangelist whom He has mightily used, but who, with his party, has now been without work for months.

Mrs. A. E. W. asks prayer that son may again take up the work of preaching the Gospel.

On account of difficulties in making up the paper, summary of the classified requests was omitted for two weeks. Added to this week's letters, the numbers are now as follows:

Seven parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; one in trouble, that child's mind may be restored; Mrs. W. E. G. and Mrs. A. P., that their husbands' minds may be restored; N. W., A Friend and A. L. M., their daughters'; C. G. R., his wife's. "Boston," that a missionary's mind may be restored. Forty-six other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives, friends or themselves.

Mrs. G. W. N. asks prayer that a minister's sight may be restored; Mrs. W. A. M., that sight of one eye may be restored; Mrs. H. B. L., that sister's and own sight may be strengthened; Mrs. E. B., that sight of eye may be restored. Forty-three other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends, relatives or themselves.

One hundred and forty friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Thirty parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit. Four wives, their husbands. Eighteen friends ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Mrs. J. C. C. asks prayer that a friend may be cured of the drug habit. Mrs. L. A. B. that brother may be cured of the drug habit. E. A. asks prayer that brother may never touch morphine again.

One in Trouble asks prayer that son may be saved and return home; S. L., that son may be reclaimed; M. A. M. L., that four sons and son-in-law may be saved. Eighty-four other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; fifty-seven wives, their husbands; one hundred and eighty-nine friends, for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Fifty-eight readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others, including a friend from Louisiana for a dear friend who gives way to violent fits of anger.

Five hundred and nineteen ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including J. F. (that a missionary may be restored to health and strength); two hundred and twenty-two friends, for healing for themselves; thirty-five friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

One hundred and twenty friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs, including C. G. R., that some one will give a good donation to start a fund for a church greatly in need of a new building, and S. E. R., who asks prayer for financial help to carry on the Gospel Tract Mission work.

One hundred and sixty-seven ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

ization are not at first apparent. The statement of the things expected to be accomplished by the affiliation shows that even authors have wrongs which must be righted. The authors want uniform conditions in contracts, the right to own their own copyrights, and the abandonment of certain traditional trade usages still maintained by publishers. The principal protection sought is protection of authors, whose stories have been printed, from what is called the piracy of the moving picture producers.

Digging Out a New Palace. The expedition under Dr. Clarence W. Fisher sent to Egypt by the University of Pennsylvania, reports the excavation of another temple near the Nile next to the temple of Moses. The temple shows evidence of damage by fire. Several chambers have been uncovered and many valuable objects have been found including gold earrings, necklaces, bronze lamps and a bronze wheel, evidently from a chariot. None of Pharaoh's family skeletons have been discovered as yet.

Educators Meet in New York. The fifty-fifth annual convention of the National Educational Association will meet at Madison Square Garden in New York City July 3-8. It is expected that at least 40,000 educators will take part in the sessions of the convention.

To Realize Moffett's Dream. The tunnel under the Continental Divide, which was the important part of David H. Moffett's plan for a new short line across the continent, is to be completed by the Denver, Northwestern and Pacific Railroad, the company now operating the Moffett railroad. The tunnel will be 4.1 miles in length and will eliminate 28 miles of 4 per cent. grades. It will take thirty-two months to complete the tunnel, and the cost will be in the neighborhood of $4,500,000.

For Transcontinental Flight. The Aero Club of America is arranging for a transcontinental aeroplane flight, on September 2, from New York to the Pacific coast. A prize of $20,000 and a silver trophy are to await the winner. At the present writing, sixteen entries have been made for the races.

To Make Holland Dry. A bill is now pending before the Parliament of the Netherlands to appropriate $90,000,000 toward the building of a dam across the Zuyder Zee. It is proposed to build a dam about fifteen miles long averaging twenty feet in height, which will replace the several hundred miles of dykes that now hold back the waters of the Zuyder Zee. The recent inundation of 40,000 acres in North Holland was due to the breaking of one of these dykes. It is estimated that when the dam is completed it will be necessary to pump out some 7,000,000,000 cubic feet of water.

Two Large Companies in Bankruptcy. The appointment of receivers for the American Real Estate Company was recently noted in the Christian Herald. On May 16 the company was petitioned into bankruptcy. On the same day the large importing house of Mills & Gibbs was also petitioned into bankruptcy following the appointment of receivers.

To Save the Pines. New York State College of Forestry is making a comprehensive study of the various rust diseases affecting forest trees. It is estimated that 70 per cent. of the standing trees in the Adirondacks are affected by some sort of fungus. All of the native evergreens except white cedar and possibly red pine are attacked by rust. In 1897 the white pine blister rust was introduced into the United States from Germany by the importation of infected trees, and has spread more or less throughout the state of New York. This rust will quickly destroy a grove of pine trees into which it is introduced. It is present also in other Eastern states, and has appeared in the province of Ontario, Canada. The state of Massachusetts has recently appropriated $10,000 for the study and control of this disease, and the emergency appropriation bill recently passed by Congress included an item of $20,000 to aid in the investigation and eradication of rust diseases in the United States.

Charting the Antarctic. The Carnegie, a non-magnetic yacht which has for several years been correcting the magnetic variations and checking the geography of little-known regions, returned to New Zealand on April 2 after circumnavigating the Antarctic regions in 120 days. The Carnegie found a number of errors on existing charts and made exhaustive surveys. A number of islands shown by existing charts the Carnegie could not find at all. If the Carnegie had had wireless equipment, she might have rescued and towed into port Shackleton's damaged ship, the Aurora, which reached New Zealand a few days ahead of the Carnegie, after a record fight with ice and blizzards and a broken rudder. At one time the Aurora, whose wireless apparatus had a rated radius of only 200 miles, succeeded in reaching stations in New Zealand 990 miles distant from her position, the message thus transmitted being the first news to the world of the failure of Shackleton's plans. The Australian government is now organizing a relief expedition to search out and rescue the Shackleton party.

Fire-proofing the World. In 1915 the United States marketed 1,731 short tons of asbestos fiber, valued at $76,952, a gain of 484 tons over 1914, 39 per cent. in quantity, but 306 per cent. in value. Canada is the chief source of asbestos for the world. The United States is the greatest manufacturer and user of asbestos products. The highest grade of asbestos found within the United States is in Arizona, where production was greatly increased in 1915. Lower grades are found in Georgia and in Vermont, while a small quantity is produced in Virginia. There are also deposits in Idaho and California.

Organizing Employers. The National Association of Manufacturers in convention in New York on May 15 reported that progress was being made in the organization of a country-wide union of employers to represent capital in dealings with the American Federation of Labor. The National Association of Manufacturers being practically committed to the open shop, the successful formation of such a union of employers will promise unending trouble and might even result in the breaking down of our present economic system. A new strike of railway operators became effective May 16 when 1,400 track workers and foremen on the Boston and Maine went on strike for an increase of twenty cents a day and a Saturday half holiday. The threatened strike of the 2,200 freight clerks on the New Haven system was compromised by the Federal Mediation Commission.

The Toll of the Mines. The report of the Department of the Interior on metal mine accidents in the United States, exclusive of coal mining, shows that during the year 1914 there were 559 men killed in the mines of the United States and Alaska, of whom nine were killed by a snowslide. This was a reduction of 124 from the year before, and was at the rate of 3.54 men per thousand employed. Besides those killed, 5,073 men were seriously injured, losing twenty days of time or more, and 25,143 suffered injuries which cost less than twenty days' time from work. The mine accidents made 252 widows and 442 orphans. In all cases these figures are less than the records for 1913, showing that precautionary measures and the safety first campaign are influencing this one of the most hazardous of employments.

YOU CAN SPREAD THE GOOD WORD

You Can Give a New and Living Interest in the Bible to Neighbors, Relatives, Friends by Presenting Them the

BIBLE PICTURE CONTEST

Every Christian man and woman knows the call of the missionary spirit—the fervent desire to bring the glad tidings to others.

But not all of us, not many of us indeed, have an opportunity to gratify that longing. Every person has his or her work to do in the world, and an important part of it is often a duty to those nearest.

Here, however, in the Bible Picture Contest, is a real opportunity to do one's duty to those farther away—to friends, neighbors, relatives, who need the message told to them again. Most of these need to be awakened.

In the Bible Picture Contest the message is told in a way that will arouse interest and command attention.

Those letters to the left are a very few from present contestants. Hundreds upon hundreds of similar ones have come to us. They tell the story; they inform you, in words you cannot mistake or misunderstand, of the good you can do by bringing the Contest to the attention of others.

The Christian Herald itself arouses and awakens an interest in Christian activities, in what the world is doing today to carry on the word of Christ. We believe the Bible Picture Contest is perhaps the most effective medium we have ever devised for aiding this work. Therefore you cannot do better than secure the subscription of some one to the Christian Herald, yourself receiving the Contest Outfit for doing so. It will not be long, especially if you call the Contest to their attention, before the new subscribers will be interested in the competition also, and securing its benefits.

Or merely send us the names and addresses of two or three friends. We will gladly send them a sample copy of the Christian Herald, and all particulars.

A number of contestants for one good reason or another, such as that travel plans would prevent mailing the Reply Books later, have sent in their answers contrary to our announcement that they could not be accepted before June 19. Rather than cause anyone hardship or disappointment where we can still protect the interest of all contestants, we have retained such answers and set them aside until the announced date. But no contestant can gain any advantage by sending in replies before June 19, and merely adds to our labor and expense as we will not be prepared to handle the Reply Books before then.

Messages of Good Cheer

Can Hardly Wait for Each Issue

I am enjoying the Picture Contest very much. Can hardly wait for each issue to come. Hope I can get some of them right, and expect to. It is a good work, and I am glad to advertise it.—Mrs. Chas. F. Harris, Vermont.

Instructive and Fascinating Study

I think this Bible Contest must be a great inspiration to all who engage in it, and I hope it will awaken a great and lasting interest in the study of the Bible with all who participate in this instructive and fascinating study of the Bible.—Mrs. J. A. Hardy, Virginia.

Deriving Great Good from the Contest

I am enjoying searching the Scriptures for the answers to the pictures. I am sure we are deriving a great good from the Contest. I have sent the paper to others, and they are enjoying it, too. We can hardly wait from week to week for the Christian Herald. I am working hard for one of the prizes.—Mrs. E. Fulton, California.

Enjoyed Search for Verses

I enclose sixty cents, for which please send me the sixty pictures in the Bible Picture Contest. About one-third of a century has elapsed since I first subscribed for the Christian Herald, and I do not wish to injure my file by clipping the pictures. I have enjoyed so much my search for appropriate verses. Success to your noble efforts.—J. K. P. Sayler, Tennessee.

Eminent Men for Our Judges

A committee of seven distinguished men will judge which verses, among all those submitted by contestants, really fit the pictures best.

These Are the Eminent Men Who Will Act as Judges of the Contest

HON. JOHN WANAMAKER, merchant; former Postmaster General.

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D., author of "In His Steps."

JUDGE A. S. TOMPKINS, New York State Supreme Court.

HON. P. P. CLAXTON, United States Commissioner of Education.

DR. HENRY OTIS DWIGHT, Recording Secretary, American Bible Society.

DR. WILBERT W. WHITE, D.D., President, New York Bible Training School.

PROFESSOR JAMES M. GRAY, D.D. Dean of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago

Back Pictures Are One Cent Each

Back pictures may be purchased at one cent each, whether you gel one or more. But of course all th sixty pictures are given free to every person who secures an outfit.

Merry Moments

HE WAS DOUBLY WELCOME.—The new minister was invited out to supper. He was a bachelor, and when he helped himself to the biscuits for the third time he looked across the table at the hostess' little girl. "I don't often have such a good supper as this, my dear," he said in his most propitiatory tone. "We don't either," said the little girl, smiling. "I'm awful glad you came."

NEEDED A BRAKE.—Farmer Hans was in search of a horse. "I have the very thing you want," said the stableman, "a thoroughgoing road horse. Five years old, sound as a quail. $175 cash down, and he goes ten miles without stopping." Hans threw his hands skyward. "Not for me," he said. "I vouldn't gif you five cents for him. I lif eight miles out in de country und I'd haf to valk back two miles."

IN IMMINENT DANGER.—The dangers of the higher education are seldom exposed so nakedly as in the case of an East Side mother, who wrote the following letter to her boy's teacher:

"Please do not push Tommy too hard, for so much of his branes is intelleck that he ought to be held back a good deal, or he will run to intelleck entirely, and I do not desire it. So please hold him back so as to keep his intelleck from getting bigger than his body, and injuring him for life."—Exchange.

A VALUABLE HORSE.—In an Ohio town there was a groceryman who kept the most emaciated looking horses in the whole State. One day the delivery boy drove one of the nags a bit too hard, and finding a soft spot in the lower end of the township, the horse lay down and peacefully died. Large commotion, of course, on the part of the owner.

"I'm awfully sorry, Mr. Brown," said the agitated boy. "I didn't go to do it."

"You are sorry, are you?" yelped the agitated Mr. Brown. "Well, is that going to pay me for the loss of the horse?"

"No, sir," answered the boy. "I will pay for the horse all right. You can take him out of my next week's wages."—Exchange.

AFTER THE FASHION OF CONGRESS.—"How quickly some of those immigrants assimilate our ideas and methods."

"As for instance?"

"Well, I asked my Italian barber if he was going home to fight, and he said he wasn't, that he had paired with an Austrian in the next block."—Boston Transcript.

HIS FAME ASSURED.—"Who was George Washington, Nellie?" asked the teacher of a little girl in the primary department.

"He was Mrs. Washington's second husband," was the truthful but unexpected reply.

EQUINE REPAIRS.—Subaltern—Well, what do you want?

Tommy (formerly a cobbler)—The Cap'n's 'orse wants soleing and 'eeling, sir.—London Punch.

LESS THAN NOTHING.—"I don't think I deserve zero on this examination," said the pupil, as he took his geometry papers.

"No, I do not either, John, but that was the lowest I could give you," said the teacher.

"COMMAND the children of Israel that they bring unto thee pure olive oil beaten for the light, to cause the lamps to burn continually." Thus reads the law in Leviticus 24 : 2. Even before the days of the Exodus, olives were an important crop throughout the country of Palestine. Today they are still an important crop, and the pressing out of the oil is an equally important industry. In our cover picture, we see a patient camel, muzzled and treading a never-ending path, operating an olive press of ancient design in one of the caverns quarried out of a limestone hill in old Jerusalem. It is even possible that from here came some of the stones that were used in the walls of Solomon's Temple, or perhaps Nehemiah's workmen quarried here stone that was to repair the breaches in the temple and in the city's wall. It is fortunate that oil can be purified, otherwise most of us would not care for the product of this little factory. One thing is evident, the owners of this factory do not propose to deplete their stock of oil by home consumption, for the lamp on the wall could by no means burn olive oil—and in the corner beyond the foreman is a stack of cans, the unmistakable mark of the kerosene trade in the East.

The New Bishops

Mount Union College and at Allegheny College. His appointments have been many, the last being St. James Church, Chicago, and from which he was elevated to the episcopacy. A man who can stay thirty years in important pastorates as Bishop Mitchell has done has about every element of success in his composition, and is fit for any office to which the Church may call him.

DR. FRANKLIN HAMILTON was then elected. He was born August 9, 1866, in Pleasant Valley, Ohio, finished his preliminary education at the Boston Latin School in 1883, and was graduated from Harvard University in 1887. For a time he was professor of Greek and Latin in Chattanooga University. In 1892 he was graduated from the Boston University School of Theology. He spent nearly three years in postgraduate study at Berlin University, in Paris and Berlin. He joined the New England Conference in 1891, and remained a member of it till his elevation to the episcopacy, representing it three times at the General Conference. In May, 1907, he was elected chancellor of the American University at Washington, D. C. He has written extensively for journals and magazines and has lectured in all parts of the country. When M. S. Hughes was elected it was the first time in the history of the Methodist Episcopal church that two brothers were bishops in her communion. And the same scene of enthusiasm was repeated when Bishop John W. Hamilton went down to the New England delegation and escorted to the platform for introduction his youngest brother, Bishop Franklin Hamilton.

The most significant feature of the election of the new bishops is that four out of seven of them are the sons of Methodist preachers. What an eloquent tribute to the good blood and splendid training of a Methodist parsonage. The election of these seven to the episcopacy was made necessary by the death of five bishops during the quadrennium, true prophets of God who went to their reward, and by the automatic retirement of two who had reached the time limit. These two were Bishops Earl Cranston and John W. Hamilton.

To Feed Five for $7.50

THE result of tests covering two years at Beth Israel Hospital, N. Y., is given as proof that a family of five, two adults and three children, can be maintained in good health at a cost of $7.31 a week. The diet, which can be provided at this cost, is itemized as follows:

1 lb. butter	$0.42
1 bag sugar (3½ lbs.)	.24
1 lb. rice	.08
1 lb. dried peas	.09
1 lb. beans	.09
1 lb. farina	.06
1 lb. oatmeal	.05
1 box cocoa (¼ lb.)	.10
1 lb. prunes	.15
1 lb. onions	.04
6 lbs. potatoes	.22
1 head cabbage (medium size)	.05
1 lb. cheese	.22
2 doz. eggs	.60
2 lbs. meat daily at 20 cts.	2.80
2 loaves of bread daily at 8 cts.	1.12
2 qts. milk daily at 7 cts	.98
Total	$7.31

The experts of the hospital claim that this diet includes all the nutritive elements in the proportions required to maintain life at full vigor. While this might be a sufficient diet, it is doubtful if the $7.50 which the Health Department of New York has dared to suggest as a sufficient expenditure for such a family will be readily accepted as the basis of an adequate wage by the fathers of many of these families.

I LOOK forward every week to my Herald and can truly say that I don't see how I could get along without its regular visits. Questions and Answers

SUBSCRIBER'S SON, Southwestern Iowa. 1. In view of Paul's statement that "all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8 : 28), how does a child of God in bodily affliction know whether it is the divine plan to call him to heaven or to give him healing through prayer and faith? 2. What counsel can be given to one who, though having the assurance that all is well with his soul, still has a great physical shrinking from death?

1. As has been frequently stated in these columns, one of the chief, if not the chief, purpose of prayer is that the individual may find out what is the will of God concerning him, rather than that any personal wish or whim may be granted. Prayer brings the soul into conscious communion with God, it awakens in the soul new love for God. And when the soul has reached this state it realizes the truth of this statement of Paul's. We are so sure of God's love that we know that nothing can harm us; we are not so greatly concerned that our wish shall be carried out as that he shall have complete right of way in our lives, and that nothing shall hinder the perfect carrying out of his will for us. It is at a time of such spiritual blessing as this that one who is in physical weakness or pain may expect to have God's will in his case made clear. He may see so clearly that his work for God is still undone; he may realize so fully God's power to heal that he will receive the assurance that he is to be healed. Or he may be led to see that it is God's will to take him to the land of greater power and greater opportunity. In that case he will have Paul's desire to "depart and be with Christ, which is far better." In most cases, however, we can be sure that God wants us to live and be strong for this work. If our faith were stronger, we should be less often ailing, and should receive greater measures of his strength for our present work helping others. 2. A rich spiritual blessing, flooding the soul with love and joy and peace, will go far to take away the fear of death. This fear is almost always accompanied with spiritual or mental depression, and as we are freed from such depression by the Holy Spirit's power we shall escape the fear. In these strenuous days, when so many men are facing death without flinching, there is less excuse than ever for the Christian to fear. Hard work for others will also help to drive out this fear. The soul that is fully trusting Christ to cleanse and keep, and that is on fire with zeal and determination to save and help others in the name of Christ, has little time to spend in fear and doubt. If these persist, however, it is often wise to consult a careful physician, as fears often indicate a diseased condition of the nerves or some hidden mental trouble that can be cured by the right sort of treatment.

W. S. F., San José, Calif., writes: "In the Christian Herald of April 19 I was very much impressed by the first article from 'Reader, Pennsylvania.' My sympathies go out to him deeply, because I know what it is to lose a good Christian wife. When the blow came I went straight to the Master and pleaded his promises (Matt. 11: 28, 30). He kept his word, as he always does, and I wonder when I think how I have been able to bear the stroke so well. But I understand it. Often I feel that she is near me. We were married fifty years and were making preparations for our golden wedding; but now we shall have a better meeting when I meet her and the rest in heaven."

S. Y., Buffalo, Okla., writes: "Since the American people worship the god Mammon, how can we expect the God of heaven to protect us? Isn't it necessary for us to depend on the God that we worship?" It is unfortunately only too true that Mammon-worship has become our national sin. We see on every side the evidence of this. Material success is proclaimed as the highest good to be achieved, and the spiritual life and its call to the soul of man is forgotten.

A. B., Milton, N. Y. What you have regarded as a discrepancy between Gen. 7: 1 and 7: 12 is explained by the commentators to mean that the rainfall lasted forty days and nights, but it was 150 days from the beginning of the flood before the waters subsided.

M. E. S., Baraboo, Wis. 1. There is no passage in Scripture which justifies the doctrine of a purgatorial state. Matt 5 : 26 is regarded as a piece of prudential advice, to settle our disputes with one another and keep out of the hands of the law. 2. Samson's words in Judges 15: 18 meant that those who had guessed his riddle must have got the answer by trickery, with the aid of his wife, who did not honorably respect the secret. Your other question is answered by mail.

W. G., Orchards, Wash. The origin of names is a big subject, and cannot be discussed satisfactorily in a Mail-Bag paragraph. Many names are based on personal characteristics, as strength or weakness, complexion, temperament, place of birth, or with reference to the surroundings. We would suggest that you look up the subject in some good encyclopedia in a reference library.

B. J. W., Pilot Mountain, N. C. See answer to Reader in the May 31 issue. We see nothing wrong in the games you mention, provided they are not a means of gambling, or played to waste time, which should be devoted to some other purpose. We certainly do not believe that religion should bar a person from rational amusement.

A. W., Brooker, Fla. The resurrection of Jesus Christ—his triumph over death and the grave—was the glorious assurance of a future life for those who believe and accept him as their Redeemer. See I Cor. 15, which deals specially with this subject. Professor David Smith in the passage you quote did not discuss the state of the righteous dead further than to convey the meaning that they are in God's care; but he did mean that they were beyond the need of human intercession, their earthly career being at an end. His words are almost a paraphrase of those of Paul in the 19th verse of the chapter referred to.

Reader, Los Angeles, Calif., writes us concerning doctrines taught by certain sects which are not in accordance with the Word of God, and in which the whole scheme of Redemption is left out. Reader adds: "Surely this is a fulfilment of New Testament prophecy, that in the last days perilous times shall come, and false teachers, teaching what has the form of godliness but denying the power thereof." It is a time for Christians to hold fast to the faith and take care not to be led astray by false doctrines. Any teaching that fails to recognize Jesus Christ as the divine Saviour, and which ignores the Resurrection and the Atonement, is of the class indicated in Matt. 24: 24. The substitution of subtle philosophies and attractive sophistries for divine truth while it may "deceive many," will utterly fail in the end, for any doctrine that is not of God cannot stand. It may flourish for a time, but being founded on error, it must ultimately pass away.

J. C. W., Mason City, Ill. It is a common saying that "the days of miracles are past," but it is impossible to justify such a conclusion. God's power is not shortened, and he is as willing to listen to the appeal of faith as ever. The world has grown too materialistic, and faith has declined; yet there are thousands of Christians who can tell of miraculous events in their own experience, of prayers answered, lives transformed, help received in dire distress and great wrongs righted. These to the believing mind are miracles unexplainable by any natural means.

Inquirer, New York. The late Sir Alexander Simpson, one of the most distinguished physicians of a generation, was by no means unorthodox. On the contrary, according to his biographers, he was a "passionate believer in evangelization and revivals, and he did all he could to support the work of spreading the Gospel. While holding broad views, he ver took the side of those theorists and pl iso- phers "who make sport of the outwo of faith, remove theological landmarks ar lay low the ramparts of dogma." He was ra r a Christian of the old-fashioned type, v a fine spiritual warmth and tenderness l len under an outward conservatism; much ven to philanthropy and a very regular atte ant at worship. Two of his sons were trai to theology, one now being a professor, ar the other a minister.

Mrs. A. J. S., Baileys Harbor, Wis. The passage in Rev. 22: 2 describes the hea nly city, the New Jerusalem. The Revised V ion gives in the margin the preferred trans on. "crops of fruits" instead of "leaves, and "health-giving" for "healin to secure against all manner o ck- ness.

Mrs. C. H., Hudsonville, ch. We have not heard of any r la- tion of the kind. Write to Int na- tion Bureau, Post Office D rt- ment, Washington, D. C.

W. M. S., Lamont, Neb. The question is controversial, an dis- cussion in the Mail-Bag wou not settle it. God regards the iri rather than the form of t ob- servance.

J. M. B., Dayton, Was 1 There are certain areas in na, almost all of Tibet, and many her parts of Asia, besides large cts of Africa, where the Gospel still unknown. Letters from m on- aries occasionally state that hey have been Gospel pioneers in rri- tory visited within a recent nte. 2. Pastor Sheldon's story was pt a recital of facts, but a work the imagination. 3. Jesus himse aid of the events you mention t, no man knoweth the day no the hour, not even the angels. The Christian's attitude should l one of spiritual preparation, aw ing the time when the divine wil hall bring them to pass. All l nan efforts, thus far, to set dates l the fulfilment of prophecy have led.

R. G. E., New Stanton, Pa. ere are many voices in nature, an hey all rise acceptably to their ker in concord, although their va y is infinite. Birds in their songs, f ers in their varied odors and colo are all a part of the great divin an. Men worship in different to ues and with widely different fo s of service, but he looks to the art rather than to the outward rm. Christian churches may dif in many things, just as an arm ay have different regimental l ers and flags, yet serving und one Commander, and fighting wit one united purpose. We should n vex ourselves on account of diffe ces in observances, when the eat essentials are held by all alike

M. A. S., Litchfield, Conn., sends an el- lent suggestion, which we gladly pass al to our readers everywhere It would be a eat thing if this plan could be adopted a national signal. But we will let M. S. explain it in her own way. She writes: We live on a back-country road, half a mil om the village. There are two churches th a Congregational and an Episcopal C ch. The latter has a bell. About one o'clock lay it rang loud and long. My husband call my attention to the prolonged ringing, so diff nt, it seemed to us, from the usual call to 2 o'clock service. 'Perhaps,' I said, 'th is peace!' Could that be it? we wondered it rang on, and on, and on. We watched a passing team. At last two young men w ed past. We put the question to them, b our hopes had outrun the fact. Peace ha not come. In our pleasant but monotonou fe everything is an event more or less sugge ve. 'Why,' I finally thought, 'why not pas he idea on to the Christian Herald, that won ful center of live ideas? There are so many it- ing, as we are, spiritually on tiptoe, to he he glad news. When it comes we want to k it right away. Can not the Christian H ald engineer a nation-wide understanding th all the church bells shall ring out the news, in ty, village, and little community, wherever th is a bell, as soon as peace is certainly ass l?

"O Christian bells, be ready:
The Day of the Lord will come.
You will ring, ring, glad and stead
To watchers in every home:
Peace! peace! for the war is ended,
And the Day of the Lord is come

JUNE

Verse and Decoration by Frances Bowdish Robinson

THE skies are deep through the long June day,
And my thoughts take wing and soar away;
Away past the bounds of the city's walls,
To the heart of green woodlands, where Nature calls.

Somewhere these breezes that kiss my face,
Over daisies and clover have given chase
To the gluttonous bees in their tireless quest
Of the hidden sweets in the flower's fair breast.

Somewhere the meadows lie warm in the sun,
And silver rivulets sparkling run
Through the long June grass where the bobolink sways
To the time of his rapturous morning lays.

The low-lying pastures are sweet with the scent
Of the wild pink rose, where, cunningly bent
O'er a clump of tall grasses, it hides from view
The song-sparrow's nest, snuggled close in the rue.

I listen, and over the waving grain
Come the notes of the meadow-lark's sweet refrain;
The insects' hum of deep content
Like a stifled echo is murmuring blent.

Here, from the great world's din apart,
Near drawn to Nature's peaceful heart,
My spirit broods in deep repose,
Nor thought of stress or burden knows.

The 128th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., in session

Presbyterians Stand by the Faith

A Great Battle for Orthodoxy Fought Out in General Assembly

CHARLES WHITEFIELD WELCH

MEMORABLE as a battle for the faith and a broad reaffirmation of hodox principles was t one hundred and nty-eighth annual eting of the General embly of the Presby- ian Church, U. S. A., which closed its Sessions day evening, May 26, at Atlantic City. It met on t Steel Pier, beginning, as is its yearly custom, on t third Thursday in May.

This Assembly of Presbyterians is only one of the t lve supreme judicatories which meet in annual con- ve to legislate for the twelve branches of the Pres- erian Church in this country; and as this Assem- represents the mother organization of that family churches holding the Presbyterian system which ludes more communicants than all the other eleven nches combined, its annual meetings are the center attention for the hundreds of thousands of Ameri- s who seek to follow in the pathway marked out by lvin, Knox, Makemie, Craighead, Witherspoon and xander, McCosh, Cuyler, Shedd and Hodge.

Not since the assemblies in which the conservative a liberal elements vied with each other in a revision the creedal statement fifteen years ago, has there n as much speculation and conjecture as there was ing the weeks before and during the initial days of s Assembly. The tenseness which surrounded the 5 commissioners and the equal number of visitors o arrived earlier than usual at the seaside resort ere the Assembly was to convene, spoke more surely attitude of interestedness of the entire denomina- n in the issues to be faced, than the many thousands words which had appeared in the church's press weeks before.

The subject occupying the chief place in the pre- embly gossip and prophecy was that relating to the bable attitude of the Assembly toward the Presby- y of New York. Following the licensing by that sbytery on April 10, of three candidates for the nistry, who had not affirmed the Virgin Birth, the sbytery of Cincinnati had overtured the Assembly "expel" the New York body from the church, if no er way could be found by which the actions of the w Yorkers would be made to conform to the ndards of presbyterial procedure, as interpreted the authors of the Cincinnati overture.

As the hour for the opening of the Assembly drew ar it became more and more clear that the differ- es between the Presbytery of New York and the er presbyteries which had aligned themselves with t of Cincinnati, were, in the last analysis, based the rights of presbyterial interpretations of the fit- ss of men to be licensed to the Presbyterian min- ry. Much bitterness had been injected into the dis- sions and formal statements which had appeared, d the contentions of the overturing presbyteries be- ne more and more pronounced as the first day of the sembly arrived, when it was learned that the oppo- nts of the Presbytery of New York were organizing ces for a solid vote, when the election of Moderator uld be held, for the Rev. William L. McEwan, pas- of the Third Church, Pittsburgh. The sixteen com- ssioners from the Presbytery of New York— ctically all of whom are themselves conservative— d decided not to take any part in any pre-assembly ucuses, nor to pledge their support to any candidate the Moderatorship—were approached by many for statement of their position in the pending contro- rsy. Uniformly, they replied that the entire trouble had arisen because of an erroneous statement sent out over the whole Church; and that the whole matter had been accentuated by what they called the un-Presbyterian action of denunciations which other presbyteries had directed against them without seeking a knowledge of all the facts. They laid special emphasis upon what they claimed to be untrue and unchristian utterances made by certain individuals.

The contenders against the actions of the Presbytery of New York had claimed that the three candidates had denied the Virgin Birth of the Christ, the miracles of Jesus, the resurrection of Lazarus and the inspiration of the Scriptures. The commissioners from New York, however, had in their possession a statement signed by the three licentiates in which they affirmed their faith in the Scriptures, the miracles of Jesus, the resurrection of the dead, the pre-existence and deity of Jesus, and a growing belief in his Virgin Birth.

Rev. Wm. H. Roberts, D.D., stated clerk, and Rev. John A. Marquis, D.D., newly elected moderator

When the hour for the election of Moderator arrived Thursday afternoon, after the retiring Moderator, the Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, President of Princeton Seminary, had preached the opening sermon in the forenoon on the theme, "The Plea of Jesus for Belief in His Mission," those placed in nomination were the Rev. George L. Robinson of McCormick Seminary, Chicago; the Rev. John A. Marquis, President of Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; and the Rev. W. L. McEwan, of Pittsburgh. The immense auditorium on the Steel Pier was crowded with commissioners and the hundreds of visitors who had been attracted by the prospect of a war of eloquence and by an opportunity of witnessing the first demonstration of the alignment of the commissioners. Dr. Marquis was chosen by 616 votes.

The overtures regarding the Presbytery of New York were referred to the Committee on Bills and Overtures, which reported to the Assembly on the following Wednesday. The intervening days had been filled with intensest excitement and the wildest of prophecies as to the outcome of the contest which overshadowed all other deliberations. The question on the lips of everyone was, "What will be done with the Presbytery of New York?"

The report was read to the Assembly by its chairman, the Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, as the first order of the day, on Wednesday, May 24. Promptly at 9 o'clock, when the Assembly was called to order by Moderator Marquis, the immense auditorium on the Steel Pier was packed to the doors with eager and expectant listeners. The first statement of the chairman of the Committee was to the effect that the report to be presented in the New York case had been unanimously agreed upon by the committee. This relieved the excitement, for it had not been expected, since certain members of the Committee were known to be standing for the contentions of the widely separated schools of theological thought in the Church.

When the report of the Committee had been adopted with a spirited unanimity, the delegation from the Presbytery of New York arose in a body and began to sing the hymn "Blest Be the Tie that Binds." The whole Assembly arose and joined in the singing, while tears streamed from many eyes. Thus was closed one of the most dramatic incidents ever witnessed in this conservative body of churchmen. The report unanimously agreed upon by the Committee and adopted unanimously by the General Assembly is as follows:

"IN answer to certain overtures complaining of the action of New York Presbytery, 'In receiving and licensing candidates for the Ministry, whose theological beliefs do not accord with the doctrinal standards of our Church?' and to Overture No. 26, calling for a deliverance, 'declaring that it is not only discourteous and unwarranted, but also unchristian and subversive of proper discipline for one Presbytery to assent that the ministers of another Presbytery or Presbyteries are untrue to their ordination vows,' your Committee begs to present the following report:

"Commissioners from New York Presbytery and representatives of overturing Presbyteries appeared before the Committee and made full and frank statements as to the issues involved. Complaint was made against the members of New York Presbytery for licensing recently and on previous occasions candidates who could not affirm their belief in the essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards, that our Lord Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary. The members of New York Presbyteries felt deeply pained and aggrieved that the Overturing Presbyteries should propose drastic action, not on the basis of the Presbytery's record, but on the basis of exaggerated and misleading newspaper reports. The brethren on both sides of the controversy, together with the members of your Committee, expressed their strong conviction that this continued agitation was bringing reproach upon the Church, was hindering the cause of Christ, and that something must be done effectually to put a stop to it. It was proposed that these brethren themselves should confer as to the best remedy for the whole trouble. Having done so in a most earnest, prayerful and forbearing spirit, they presented a paper which to their minds embodied all that the exigencies of the situation demand, and which gave great hope for the future peace and harmony of the Church. Your Committee gave this paper due consideration, and were grateful to God for the manifest leading of the Holy Spirit, which had brought the aggrieved parties together, and which we felt led us, your Committee, to the unanimous approval of said paper as the basis of suitable action on the part of the Assembly.

"We therefore, recommend the adoption of this paper in the earnest hope that it will allay all misunderstanding, prevent in the future any hasty or ill-advised judgment in public print of brethren in good and regular standing in the ministry, and serve as a warning for the ministry who cannot give their assent to all the fundamental doctrines of the Church.

"Whereas, the records of the Presbytery of New York show that on April 10th, 1916, that Presbytery licensed three candidates for the ministry, who neither affirmed nor denied the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, on the following recommendation, 'nothing that these candidates recognize critical difficulties in connection with the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, but at the same time state that their faith in this doctrine is of a growing character and that they unqualifiedly declare their faith in the pre-existence and Deity of our Lord and all the redemptive truth that is embodied in His life, teaching and His sacrificial death.'

"And whereas, it is admitted that by the Constitution of the Church each Presbytery is the judge of qualifications of candidates for the ministry, but such Presbytery in licensing these candidates should strictly observe the declaration of the Confession of Faith in doctrinal matters.

"The General Assembly calls the attention of the Presbyteries to the deliverance of the General Assembly of 1910, which is as follows:

"1. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards, that the Holy Spirit did so inspire, guide and move the writings of Holy Scripture as to keep them from error.

"2. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards, that our Lord Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary.

"3. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standard, that Christ offered up 'Himself' a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice and to reconcile us to God.

4. "It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God and our standards concerning our Lord Jesus Christ, that on the third day he arose from the Dead with the same body with which he suffered, with which he also ascended into Heaven and there sitteth at the right hand of His father, making intercession.

"5. It is an essential doctrine of the Word of God as the supreme standard of our faith that our Lord Jesus showed His power and love, working mighty miracles. This working was not contrary to nature, but superior to it.

"Presbyteries are hereby enjoined not to license or ordain any candidates for the ministry whose views are not in accordance with this deliverance of 1910.

"This General Assembly renews its positive mandate with full expectation of loyal compliance by all our Presbyteries, and directs that when a candidate appears who is found to be not clear and positive on any one of the fundamentals of our faith, that his licensure be deferred until such time as in the judgment of the Presbytery he has become so."

THE next most anxiously awaited report was that of the Committee on Bills and Overtures regarding its recommendations in the Union Theological Seminary case which had to do with appeals from nineteen presbyteries, demanding that the Assembly take steps to recover from Union Theological Seminary a large block of its $5,000,000 endowment. These appealing presbyteries based their claim for the Assembly's action in this matter on what they insist is a diversion of funds which were originally given for the specific purpose of supporting an orthodox Presbyterian S inary; and they aver that since Union Seminary disclosed its independence of the church and is careful as to its orthodoxy, the Assembly is un obligation to sue to recover certain funds which t claim to be able to prove would not have been give the present attitude of that institution had b known.

The Committee on Bills and Overtures, in rep ing, recommended that a committee of three minis and four laymen be appointed to investigate the en matter of the relation of the Assembly to the Se naries connected with it. This report was un mously adopted, and since there has been no relat existing between Union Seminary and the Assem for several years, it was generally thought that t institution would not again be made the object o Assembly investigation.

OTHER matters which received the most enthus tic and enheartening attention were the rep of the standing committees on Foreign Missions, S bath Observance, Temperance and Home Missions. of these were the cause of the most optimistic prophe for the Church's progress and increasing strength.

The movement which has gained strength throu out the church favoring the consolidation of som the administrative agencies of the Assembly wh have seemed to overlap in the exercise of their fu tions, succeeded in influencing the Assembly to thorize the consolidation of the Board of Educa and the College Board. This was contested on ground that it would likely involve the two agen in legal and charter entanglements; but the force favor of the merger, led by President John Willis of Occidental College, and President Ross Steven of Princeton Seminary, won out, and the Execu Commissioner was authorized to effect the consol tion and name the new board the "General Edu tional Board."

The Assembly accepted the invitation from churches and city officials of Dallas, Texas, to m in that city next year.

"Boys Will Be—"?

By Fred H. Rindge, Jr., M.A., Sec'y Industrial Service Movement

IN times of war the boys of the nation turn with admiration toward the heroes of war. This is natural and in a sense beneficial. But let them not forget the heroes and ideals in realms of peace. As never before there is needed a reappraisement of heroism. This study of boy life with special reference to its hero-worship is timely and significant.

"SAY, mister, gimme one of them papers with the pictures in it." The combined effect of pleading and command called our attention to an ordinary "street boy" who had entered the office of the college "Daily." The editor was a human fellow and asked kindly, "What pictures?" "Oh, the pictur's of Micky and Jummy and—"

Had we not interrupted, the youngster might have mentioned the nicknames of the entire football team. Of course he knew them all! Had he not talked over all the big games with the rest of his gang? Were these men not his heroes? And probably "Micky" and "Jack" and the rest were all unconscious of it. If they had been more conscious of this young hero worshipper perhaps their influence would have been better at times. And what of the thousands of other boys just like this one? Not just like him, of course, for no two boys are alike, but at certain ages all normal boys have their heroes, and I am interested in both the heroes and the boys!

How many of us realize that "Micky" or "Jack" may have more real influence over that boy than anyone else on earth? And how do we know our name is not "Jack," even if we never played football? It was a wise student of boy life who said, "He who has won the friendship of a boy, stands in the presence of a great opportunity." Recently at Ann Arbor, Michigan, three thousand boys attended a conference. When the students of the University of Michigan were asked to accommodate many of these boys in their homes and fraternity houses they responded loyally. Great care had to be taken that the right kind of fellows acted as hosts. One of the leading men of the city said, "This is a great chance for college men to show what they are really made of. Some of these boys have a warped idea of a college student as a smoking, drinking, swearing snob with a peanut cap on the back of his head. What a chance to prove that the true college man is a Christian gentleman." And the proof was given!

"'It would be absurd to start meetings for these boys. They're a worthless lot'"!

Recently a Philadelphia employer said to me, "It would be absurd to start meetings for the boys in this factory. They're a worthless lot, and would not appreciate it!" But many employers know better, and we asked him to permit a trial. The foreman accompanied us as we went around the shop and talked with the boys. "Who is captain of the University of Pennsylvania football team?" You should have heard the chorus. Certainly, they knew him. "How would you like to have him talk to you fellows some day?" "Gee!" The look was enough. He went. So did the captains of the baseball, track and wrestling teams and other "heroes."

"Walking along the railroad track one afternoon"

For months the student Young M Christian Association sent to those a series of "athlete speakers" talked at noon hour on "Clean Li and Clean Athletics," "Building C acter," etc. Fifty boys are differen day, because some one believed in t and took the trouble to help. Th youngsters have proved that "a will grow to be the kind of a boy thinks you think he is."

WALKING along a railroad t one Saturday afternoon we covered a stone hut, in which were factory boys playing cards and "ta turns" on a pipe. They were the lea of a gang, and the others had been out "to swipe tin to cover over the ro" At last we had found the headqua of the terrors of the town. Perhaps should have had them arrested, but didn't. Instead of a policeman we a young college graduate who liked and who believed that every boy c be reached if one could only t the hidden spring. ht, when he sees that the lives of boys out him are being influenced by his? social worker has well said, "Perhaps nan cannot know a thousand boys, t a thousand boys can know one man." is a supreme privilege to the "one n," and it makes no special difference ether the "one man" is a college n or a working man, a big man or a le man, an athlete or an "intellec- l"—he may even be an older boy— long as he is a man!

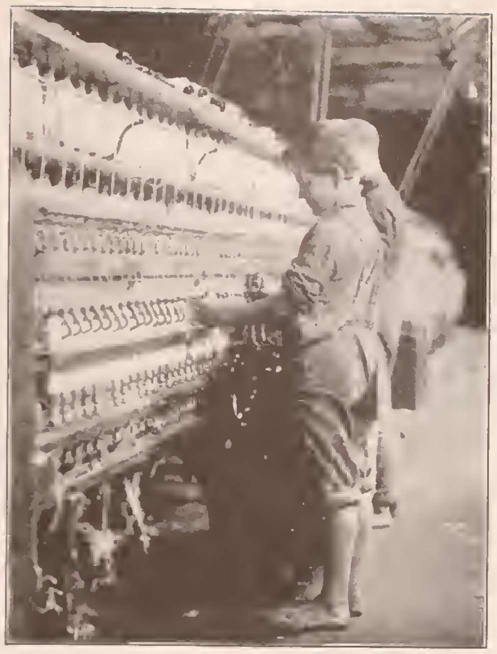
have purposely given illustrations of at college men are doing to help solve boy problem, not because they are ng more than anyone else, but be- se the whole Social Service Move- nt in our colleges is of such far-reach- significance. The many extension ivities of Universities like Cornell, nsylvania, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, es and others are nothing short of azing in their extent and efficiency. dents themselves are more awake to ir responsibility than in the past. tions and debates deal more than ever h human problems and human needs. mmencement addresses are sounding w the note of service and obligation. e of the most interesting, strategic l far-reaching of the many lines of vice is the work with boys. Of course, s takes many other forms beside se already illustrated. It may be cational, social, recreative, religious; l the ideal is a combination of these.

Hundreds of college men have even en up their Easter and Christmas idays in order to make long "deputa- n trips" to needy communities. Such its are made by special "teams" of dents throughout the year at "week- ls" in towns of from 1500 to 2000 ple. The program consists of basket- l games, hikes, cial meetings for h men and boys, d so forth. Of rse, these pro- ms vary greatly ording to the co- ration of local in- iduals, and organi- ions. But the inite purpose is nkly a call to bet- living—especially the boys of the n. The principle hero-worship is de the most of all times. The d of reaching the n who influence life, is also recog- ed.

n this connection esident Chase, sident of Bates llege, Maine, re- tly wrote me as ows:

> am profoundly im- ssed by the Industrial vice Movement. I am olly convinced that re is no work of ater importance to our country and to the ntenance and development of our Christian lization than this work. We simply must rish and manifest in the most practical y possible our sympathy with the industrial kers of our time. . . . Our colleges cannot to ally themselves with this movement and to engage for it the intelligent enthusiasm and aid of our students, without leaving undone one of their most sacred and important duties. The college has no greater mission than to prepare its students to become sympathetic and efficient leaders in improving industrial conditions in our country and in helping those who are bearing the burdens of our great industries to obtain and enjoy in large measure the highest satisfaction of life.



"And what of the thousands of other boys just like this one?"

WE might talk about school boys, street boys, factory boys, idle boys, rich boys, poor boys, neglected boys, dependent boys, delinquent boys, negro boys and foreign boys,—but they are all boys, having much in common, though the methods of service are very different. At any rate it is better to train a boy than to restrain him, to form him than to reform him, to use him than abuse him, to prevent him than to punish him.

Of course, a modern city association or institutional church is not satisfied with its religious, educational, social and physical work in the building, but has for its aim the reaching of all the boys in the community. This involves a generous and thorough co-operation with all other local agencies working along similar lines, and with state and national agencies.

This principle of working co-operatively with existing organizations has probably been carried to its largest measure of success in the service in rural communities (the so-called "County Work") and in the comparatively new type of organization, known as "Community work." Possibly this new form of work grew out of the idea that "an expert leader and a vacant lot are a better combination than an expert building and a vacant secretary." But there are mighty few "vacant" secretaries, for the very highest type of men are constantly demanded. At any rate, this form of work requires no Young Men's Christian Association building in communities of from 5,000 to 20,000 population. The secretary has merely an office and works through and with the homes, churches, schools, charities, clubs and other organizations.

"Perhaps one man cannot know a thousand boys, but a thousand boys can know one man"

The following is an illustration of some things which were accomplished in one community in less than three years: The Association secretary and ministers established and promoted recess play, made possible gymnasium classes for boys and girls in high school building, promoted Bible study clubs for high school students, co-operated with teachers and principals in dealing with unfortunate children. Organized supervised playgrounds. As a result of co-operation with school authorities, the school plant was put at the disposal of the public for a social center. He organized boy scouts, camp fire girls, trained the leaders, etc.; promoted home and school gardens, stimulated sentiment which made possible a home for homeless boys. He also organized, in the factories, recreative games, Bible classes, first-aid-to-the-injured groups, shop talks and other features. He conducted interscholastic field day for two states; co-operated with Sunday schools in finding and training Sunday school teachers and club leaders, and men for special tasks; helped Ministerial Association in fight on red light district; co-operated with child labor committee in preventing change in child labor law which would have been detrimental to child interests of the state. He established a local censorship of motion pictures, worked with the probation officer, boy scout commissioner, charities director and others. Work with individuals was never forgotten and scores of boys were led into lives of service. How many boys followed that secretary as their hero?

IT is evident that the Christian Church in all its work, must stand for the four inalienable rights of boyhood. First: The right of the boy to be well born. Second: The right to a normal play life. Third: The right to a good school education. Fourth: The right to a normal expression of the religious life. One expert has well said "There is a world of difference between work with boys and boys' work. The first is what you do for boys, the second is what you get boys to do. You can never make a strong man out of a boy by doing things for him. Helping boys to help themselves is good business, but helping them to help others is better." Hence the importance of training of older boys to work with younger boys. The "hero" ideal is constantly before them. Service is the keynote.

Some secretaries are securing co-operation from the "bosses" in the shops. In one large factory evil conditions which had for years surrounded apprentices have been eliminated. Working boys especially need wholesome recreation, education and inspiration. They must be guided in their life career and whatever their jobs they need a conception of their relationship with others and the right attitude toward the great industrial and social problems of the day and toward Jesus Christ, the ideal Hero!

MARKING TIME IN MEXICO. The expedition under Col. Sibley and Major Langhorne, having dispersed the outlaws who raided Glenn Springs and Boquillas and having rescued the two American captives of the bandits, returned to American soil on May 22. The troops under General Pershing have made no moves of any military significance during the past two weeks, but it was reported that General Obregon had moved 30,000 Carranza troops into northern Mexico to cope with the bandit situation. On May 31, a note from Carranza was delivered to the State Department at Washington in which he again repeated, but with greater emphasis, his request for the withdrawal of the American forces from Mexican territory. It was felt in Washington that the note was largely written for home consumption and reports on the following day from Mexico City indicated that it had there performed its function. Officials in Washington stated that American forces will not be withdrawn from Mexico until it is conclusively shown that the Carranza government is strong enough to control the situation.

GERMAN DYE STUFFS HELD UP. It was reported from London on May 26 that Lord Cecil, Minister of War Trade, had stated in the Commons and also in an interview, that England would not consent to pass the shipment of dye stuffs for America, the exportation of which the German government had agreed to permit. In this connection, two recent reports are of considerable interest. German producers of dye stuffs are reported to be arranging to pool their interests so that after the war, all processes, discoveries and every item of trade advantage will be shared in common, while the whole industry in Germany will be put upon the most complete basis of industrial efficiency in order to meet the trade situation which is expected to result in the establishment of dye industries in England and the United States, supported by tariffs or preferential legislation. The industry is even contemplating the establishment of plants in foreign countries if it should become necessary. Another report coming from England about the same time, chronicled the organization in England and her colonies, of a gigantic boycott against Germans and German goods, to become effective immediately upon the close of the war, and the restoration of what should be normal conditions. The effort is said to be meeting with remarkable success throughout the British empire, and laws have been introduced into Parliament designed to make effective some plans of the organization which could not be consummated under present law. A part of the plan to exclude German goods from British territory necessarily includes the reorganization of British industry in order that it may produce merchandise capable of competing with the product of the German factories. It is claimed that this British movement has found sympathizers in both Spain and Argentina.

A NEW WIRELESS RECORD. On May 24, the American steamship Ventura, reported from Sydney, New South Wales, that on the voyage out from New York, she had picked up a wireless message of the Tuckerton, N. J., station when 9,000 miles distant from that point. This is said to be a new record for wireless transmission.

BANKERS FOUND NOT GUILTY. The executive officers of the Riggs National Bank, Washington, charged with perjury in connection with the troubles between the bank and the Secretary of the Treasury, were found not guilty on May 27. This is probably the first time in the history of the United States when two ex-Presidents have testified at the same trial, both Taft and Roosevelt having been called by the defense as character witnesses.

SUPPORT PRICE FIXING BILL. A recent referendum submitted to the Chambers of Commerce of the United States on the subject of price fixing as provided in the Stephens-Ashurst Bill now pending before Congress, resulted in a vote of 693 to 237 in support of the principle of permitting the maintenance of retail prices, under proper restrictions, of identified merchandise. On May 30, the House Committee on Foreign Commerce heard arguments in favor of the pending measure by representatives of the National Retail Grocers' Association, the New York Pharmaceutical Association, the Independent Retail Cigar Dealers' Association, the Hardware Dealers' Association, and the New York State Retail Grocers' Association.

IT WORKS TOO WELL. Dr. Miller Reese Hutchinson, Chief Engineer for Thomas A. Edison, has recently analyzed a substitute for gasoline which was tested in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The substitute consisted of some chemical which, when added to water, worked the engine smoothly and at full power. Dr. Hutchinson's analysis developed that the material added to the water was acetone, allied to acetylene, which would produce the power without doubt, but which also produces picric d which corrodes all the metal surf es with which it comes in contact d which would require only a short ru o ruin the engine. It is not kn u whether the Enright plan recently a-nounced is of the same type or not.

British War Secretary Drowned on Warship

Earl Kitchener

LATE on Tuesday, June 6th, the startling news was received in the United States that Earl Kitchener with his staff perished in the sinking of the British cruiser Hampshire, enroute to Russia, the announcement by the British Admiralty reading as follows:

> I have to report, with deep regret that his majesty's ship Hamphire, Capt. Herbert J. Savill R. N., with Lord Kitchener and his staff on board was sunk last night at about 8 o'clock, to the west of the Orkneys, either by a mine or a torpedo.
> Four boats were seen by observers on shore to leave the ship. The wind was north-northwest and heavy seas were running. Patrol vessels and destroyers at once proceeded to the spot and a party was sent along the coast to search, but only some bodies and a capsized boat have been found up to the present. As the whole shore has been searched from the seaward, I greatly fear that there is little hope of there being any survivor.
> No report has yet been received from the search party on shore. H. M. S. Hampshire was on her way to Russia.

The Orkney Islands are just off the extreme northeastern point of Scotland. The names of the members of General Kitchener's staff are not available at the time of going to press, nor are more details known than those contained in the announcement of Admiral Jellicoe.

THE PRESIDENT ON PEACE. Addressing the Convention of the League to Enforce Peace at Washington on May 27, President Wilson said:

When the invitation to be here tonight came to me, I was glad to accept it, not because it offered me an opportunity to discuss the program of the league, (that you will, I am sure, not expect of me,) but because the desire of the whole world now turns eagerly, more and more eagerly, toward the hope of peace, and there is just reason why we should take our part in counsel upon this great theme. It is right that I, as spokesman of our government, should attempt to give expression to what I believe to be the thought and purpose of the people of the United States in this vital matter.

This great war that broke so suddenly upon the world two years ago, and which has swept within its flame so great a part of the civilized world, has affected us very profoundly, and we are not only at liberty, it is perhaps our duty, to speak very frankly of it and of the great interests of civilization which it affects.

With its causes and its objects we are not concerned. The obscure fountains from which its stupendous flood has burst forth we are not interested to search for or explore. But so great a flood, spread far and wide to every to the details of the battle itself but tt can be said at this time, since the ecnts vary greatly. The fight lasted or ull 24 hours, beginning a little past oon May 31, lasting all night and all ae ext morning. From first to last bo 150 to 160 vessels of all kinds apea to have been engaged, besides a ee of half a dozen Zeppelins.

T losses officially admitted are as ll s:

BRITISH

at Cruisers	Crew	Tons	Cost
ue Mary	1,000	27,500	$10,390,000
ivible	750	17,250	8,750,000
Idetigable	800	18,750	7,680,000

rned Cruisers	Crew	Tons	Cost
efce	700	14,600	7,000,000
lac Prince	700	13,500	6,000,000
ar	700	13,500	6,000,000

Tse ships may all be described as st line and aggregate a tonnage of 550 at a cost of $46,200,000.

Iddition to these major ships the loss e destroyers and crews is also adit d by the British Admiralty. All told, the British loss of life seems to be somewhere between 5,000 and 6,000, but this is necessarily only an estimate.

GERMAN

Battleship	Crew	Tons	Cost
Pommern	729	13,200	$6,000,000
Light Cruisers
Frauenlob	264	2,715	1,250,000
Wiesbaden	264	2,715	1,250,000
Elbing	300	3,600	1,600,000

Of these only the Pommern was of the first line. The ships aggregate 22,230 in tonnage, $10,100,000 in cost. Their united crews amounted to 1557, practically all of whom may be regarded as lost.

In addition to the above named vessels the Germans admit the loss of six destroyers. The crews of these vessels number about the same as of the British vessels of the same class. The German loss of lives may be estimated at about 2,500.

In addition to the admitted losses the Germans claim the British lost the Warspite, a battleship of 27,500 tons; the Marlborough, a battle cruiser of the same tonnage; four or five more destroyers and two submarines, the loss of which vessels the British deny.

The British claim in their turn that the Germans lost the Derfflinger, a battle cruiser, and a sister ship, each of 26,200; one battleship named the Westfalen, and another battleship unnamed; one unnamed light cruiser, two or three more destroyers, and a submarine.

The fight was begun by the Germans, under Admiral Scheer, who issued in force from their base and attacked the strong British patrol fleet off Jutland. Admirals Hood and Beatty gave battle and wirelessed the main fleet for aid. Admiral Jellicoe responded by proceeding to the scene with the Grand fleet at full speed, and the Germans, finding themselves greatly outclassed, withdrew to their base after inflicting upon the British the damage reported. Little by little the story of the great naval combat is coming out, and will be told in these columns later.

AT Verdun on Friday, May 25, the French abandoned their positions on Le Mort Homme hill on the west front of Verdun, withdrawing to a position a little north of Chattancourt and running thence to the east of the Meuse, south of Cumieres, and to the west of Esnes, across the southern slopes of Hill No. 203. The Germans were unable, however, to completely occupy the southerly slopes of Le Mort Homme Hill thus evacuated, because the larger portions thereof are still covered by the French artillery in position behind the Avocourt-Esnes-Charny road.

This withdrawal probably resulted from the capture the day before by the Germans of Cumieres, which made Le Mort Homme Hill a salient, three sides of which were in the possession of the enemy, and hence untenable. On this front the German artillery violently bombarded the French positions on this southern slope of Hill 304, apparently preparatory to an infantry assault.

The Caurette wood, just south of Cumieres, then became the scene of a battle in which the Germans attacked the French troops from three sides. The Germans look upon the capture of Cumieres village as very important, in that it connects their lines east and west of the Meuse river, and renders impossible the flanking of the fire of the Germans west of the river from French positions on the east bank.

On the northern front there was some fierce infantry fighting south of the Haudremont farm, which resulted in the recapture of the stone quarry in that region by the Germans, lost to the French a few days before. There was also hard fighting between Haudremont wood and the Thiaumont farm in the afternoon, in which the Germans gained slightly. Around Douaumont there was intense artillery fighting. On this front yesterday the Germans took some 850 prisoners and over a dozen machine guns.

On the northern front the Germans extended their positions, crossing the Douaumont ravine and gaining ground south of Fort Douaumont, in which operations they took some 600 prisoners and a few machine guns. A violent battle took place during the night of Saturday. On Sunday, the French made a most gallant effort to retake the village of Cumieres. They were successful at first but were ultimately defeated. There were heavy bombardments in the region south of Dead Man's Hill on the west front, and to the west of Thiaumont farm on the north front.

The Germans, on Monday, May 29, bombarded the French first and second lines from Avocourt to Cumieres, and at about three in the afternoon attacked with infantry and were repulsed, a second attack meeting a like fate. Between Le Mort Homme and Cumieres another German attack did succeed in winning some 300 yards of French trenches.

On Tuesday the western front in the Verdun region was the scene of rather hard fighting during the day. On the western front of the fortress the Germans made a drive to the south of the Corbeaux and Cumieres woods, to the south of the road leading from Bethincourt to Cumieres, and captured the whole line of the French positions running from the southern slopes of Dead Man's Hill on the west to a point a little south of Cumieres village, and took about 1350 French soldiers in the operation. The French, during the morning, made two attacks on Cumieres village from the direction of Chattaucourt, but failed to make any advance.

Around Verdun on Wednesday the fighting was still active on the west front of that fortified area. The Germans made two heavy infantry attacks on the French. The first was launched from Cumieres village along the railroad and the river Meuse, and had apparently the village of Chattancourt as its objective. The assault was violent and at first successful, some of the infantry even succeeding in reaching the Chattaucourt railroad station, a little to the east of the village itself. A strong counter attack by the French was successful in driving the Germans back nearly to their point of departure. The second attack was on the French positions to the south of Caurettes wood. This wood lies about a mile to the east of Cumieres and perhaps a half mile south.

The combat on Thursday continued to rage severely. On the western front of the Fortress, southeast of Dead Man's Hill, the Germans admit that during the night before, the French assaulted and captured some 400 yards of first-line trenches which the Germans were unable to recover. At the same time the French made other assaults on the German positions south of Cumieres and to the west of Hill 304, but these the Germans repulsed.

THE Austrian offensive in Italy gained ground all the week, and succeeded not only in reaching the Italian fortified line of defense running from Asiago to Asiero, but in first turning the ends thereof and afterwards breaking through the center, capturing the whole of the Italian position, and both of the above mentioned towns.

The effect of the capture of this fortified line, which is 30 miles as the crow flies from Venice, is to remove all obstacles in the way of fortifications and enable the Austrians to direct future efforts against either Vicenza or Venice, as they may desire. Such an advance on their part would render the position of the Italian army operating on the Isonzo line on the eastern border of Italy extremely precarious, as it would cut them off, as a glance at the map will show, from all the rest of Italy.

The Demand for Divine Judgment

*A SERMON BY REV. MERCER G. JOHNSTON

TEXT—Rom. 14 : 10. "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ."

IN the two great creeds of Christendom, the Apostle's and the Nicene, we Christians, of whom there are, roughly speaking, some five hundred millions on earth today, give expression to the belief that Jesus Christ will come again "to judge both the quick and the dead." What do we mean by this?

Do we mean to say that we believe in the mere fact of judgment—that is, that man is to be judged by God whether man wills to be judged or no? Or do we mean to say that we believe in the principle of judgment—that is, that God ought to judge man whether God wills to judge him or not?

If it be true that man is to be judged by God, is the practice a divine prerogative, before which man must bow whether he approves of the principle or not, or is it a human right, which God himself can neither ignore nor deny without sacrificing his title of the All-Just?

Let us look first at the belief in the fact of judgment. Is it universal, or is it limited? Is it a belief that the great majority of mankind has come by naturally, or is it a belief a majority or a minority of mankind has come by artificially? Is the belief in final judgment a fiction concocted by some ambitious religious schemer on which to found an ecclesiastical organization, and which he and his successors have foisted upon the more credulous portion of humanity, or a fiction, after the manner of Rousseau's trumped-up "Social Contract," in which a part of mankind has complacently agreed to believe as a reason for the existence of the church for ethical and police purposes? Or is the belief in final judgment a profound fact of human consciousness, discovered by disinterested men at a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and which has been confirmed by the best experience of the best men of every succeeding generation? Who will answer me?

As I stand here, a listener, as it were, in Babel, out of the general uproar I distinguish two voices. The first comes from Persia. It cries:

> What! out of senseless Nothing to provoke
> A conscious Something to resent the yoke
> Of unpermitted pleasure, under pain
> Of everlasting penalties, if broke!

THE second voice comes from ancient Israel. It cries in trumpet-like tones: "God is a righteous Judge. Righteousness and judgment are the foundation of his throne. The works of his hands are truth and judgment. Let the whole earth stand in awe of him. For he cometh, for he cometh to judge the earth, and with righteousness to judge the world and the people with his truth."

Which of these two voices speaks to the healthy sentiment of the strong man? Which has laid deepest hold upon the mind and heart of the dominant element in the dominant races of the earth? The voice of the Persian poet, whose god was the grape, or the voice of the Hebrew psalmist, whose God was the Lord, the righteous Judge?

When the universal creed of humanity is written, I make no doubt that one article of it will be: "We believe that Thou shalt come to be our Judge." Some such clause was in the first creed, is in every sincere current creed, and will be in the last creed of mankind. This article of human belief dates back to the day that Adam and Eve, with the forbidden fruit sticking in their throats, fled from the presence of the Lord God, and hid themselves among the trees of the Garden. From that day to this every man of sound mind has been estopped from pleading in defense of his wrong-doing his ignorance of the fact that he was to be called to account for his conduct. That "every one of us shall give account of himself to God," is one of the fixed facts of human consciousness. It cannot be ignored except it be ignored wilfully. Nobody except a mole-like materialist with mud on his brain, or a silly sentimentalist with tears on his brain, or a sensualist whose "god is his belly," or a moral trifler or traitor, would be tempted to ignore it. How clearly it is often recognized by the simple ones of earth!

Whether we like it or not, we are every one of us every moment of our lives being judged. Every deed we do, every word we speak, every thought we think, is evidence for or against us. This world is one of the lower courts of God's vast judiciary system, in which a preliminary hearing is forever going on.

Behold, even now, while it is called today, he cometh into our homes and places of business and pleasure and politics and worship to judge our every act and thought. Sometimes the judgment is rendered only in the depths of our own hearts. Again it is pronounced by the lips of some Christlike man or woman.

But it is not only here and now that we are judged. "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ" hereafter. And we shall stand there with no packed jury of our fellow sinners to act as a buffer between us and our Judge.

NOW, if I understand these hearts of ours aright, none of us objects to being judged. Not, at least, in our better moments; not except when the beast in us has his paw on the bosom of the angel in us. On the contrary, we demand judgment. We would never consent not to be judged. In our regard, judgment is not merely a divine prerogative. It is a human right. It is part and parcel of man's bill of rights. It is God's duty to judge us. Having made us men and not brutes, He must judge us. The heart of every true man cries: "Better far be crossed and thwarted as a man, than left in God's contempt apart." If it were decreed in heaven today that henceforth no man should be judged—that instead of the moral order that has hitherto been in force there should hereafter be an anarchy of grace—before tomorrow's sun good men everywhere would be wrestling earnestly with God in prayer to get the decree reversed. A monster petition to God for the restoration of this sacred human right would be sent up to heaven by mankind. To be deprived of the right of being judged would be to degrade man to the level of a brute or devil. To be judged is the inalienable right of a man. "The Lord judge between me and thee" are words that are flashed every moment from earth to heaven by men and nations in strong dispute.

But not only is it certain that there is to be a Day of Judgment for all mankind: it is also certain there is to be a Day of Separation. "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all his holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." Thus, and even more, saith the Scripture, Jesus Christ himself being Spokesman.

We hear a good deal of talk nowadays about a God of infinite love and overwhelming good nature, who is such a "good" God, such a "good fellow"; and we are told that it is foolish to think that this "good" God will ever make a separation between the good and the bad; that he will smile at the silly sheep, and wink at the wicked goats, and let them all pass into the heavenly fold. We hear it said that the doctrine concerning hell has been discovered to be an old wives' fable, and that it is incompatible with belief in this "good" God.

When the temptation comes to us to indulge in such foolish flabby talk, let us remind ourselves that if there is in existence such a god as this, he is not the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, but a god of recent manufacture, a man-made god, and as distinctly discreditable to his maker as was the soulless monster of the student Frankenstein to his maker. It has been well said that "had Jesus condoned sin, then he had been the destroyer of our race, and not its Saviour; for the comforting of our heart had been a poor recompense for the debauchery of our conscience. . . . His 'enthusiasm for humanity' did not blind him to deep lines of moral demarcation. His 'huge tenderness' did not propose an equality for Judas and John. . . . It is Jesus who has compared sin unto Gehenna, 'where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched'; it is Jesus who places the rich man of soft and luxurious life in torment, so that he begs for a drop of water to cool his tongue; who casts the unprofitable servant into outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; who declares that the fruitless branches of the vine will be gathered and burned; who sends the servants of self into the fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Jesus spake in parables, and it were folly to press his words into a description of circumstances. Jesus spake with marked emphasis, and it were dishonesty to deny that he believed in the fact of judgment." It were equal dishonesty to deny that Jesus believed in a real separation of men following upon final judgment.

And we men also believe both in the fact and the principle of separation following upon final judgment. Our jails and penitentiaries are witnesses against us that we do so believe. So is our feeling toward ose unconfined criminals in society who live in cor ant disregard of the laws of chastity. No man in his ber senses believes that it does not matter whet r a man lives like the apostle Paul or the emperor ro. Nothing can ever crush out the conviction fro th human heart that there must be one place for S tus Tarquinius, and another for Lucretia, the vict of his lechery; one place for Judas Iscariot the t tor and another for St. John the beloved disciple. he man who doubts this is not tender-hearted: is soft-headed and rotten-hearted.

Of course we believe in the separation of the od and the bad in the life that is to be. There is t a good man, there is not a good woman, but wo be perplexed in the extreme to find in heaven thos oul spirits whose very names desecrate the pages human history. Try as hard as we might, we coul not for a moment adore the God who was such a ral imbecile as to make no distinction between the rst and the best of mankind. Every righteous man uld rightly rebel against the rule of such a moral onstrosity, curse him to his face, and gladly tak the consequences.

SURELY we men believe in future judgmen nd in future separation. Surely we look with y rning eyes to the Lord the Righteous Judge to mak hat right in another world which has been so unspea bly wrong in this. There is an overwhelming h an demand for divine judgment and divine separ on. No man of sound mind and heart ever thoug of surrendering these inalienable human rights. But the judgment must be divine. The separation ust be divine. It is divine judgment, and divine paration, that man wants. Not the undivine judg nt, or the undivine separation, that we witness too ten on this earth.

If I thought that in the Supreme Court of H ven eternal justice would ever miscarry, as it does metimes in these lower courts on earth, because due weight is given to foolish technicalities, I too uld try to convert myself from this universal belief nd, failing that, I would deny with my dying breat the authority of the Judge. If I could bring mys t believe, as certain false theologies have taught hat the doors of heaven would be closed to those wl on this earth were not in communion with some c rch or other that made such requirements of its me ers as Jesus never made of his disciples—if I believe ch silly things, I would hate the Judge Eternal, an urt him if I could.

Ah, brethern, once we come to understand wh our Judge is to be, all such fears fall to the groun nd lie there lifeless. It is before the judgment s of Christ that we are all to stand. We are to be j ged by the Man Christ Jesus, by him who was te ted in all points like as we are. Judgment by Jes will be as though we were judged by our own obj ive conscience. There will be no dissent from his ve ts. They will be based entirely upon what we are, a we shall then see and know ourselves as we are. N by our allegiance to any church, not by our adhe nce to any code or creed, shall we be judged, but s ply by the human facts in our case, by the mora nd spiritual facts that go to make up our manhoo nd womanhood. Judgment in each case will d end upon our capacity, based upon our acquired char ter, to appreciate him who is the embodiment of al hat is good and beautiful and true within the horiz of humanity. Every one who can appreciate rist and the things that belong to Christ shall hav im and them. If you cannot appreciate him and em, you may feel sure that neither Christ nor the thi s of Christ will be forced upon you. Heaven will be ust upon nobody. And nobody will be thrust into he en. Every man will go to his own place—to the pla for which his character fits him. The good rule the eternal fitness of things will be observed.

TO-DAY Christ stands at the judgment-bar of ankind. He who is to judge us tomorrow stand be judged by us today. Are we giving him a fair ial? Are you, and you, and you? We cannot was our hands of the matter. Christ demands judgm of us. He has a right to it. It is our bounden d to judge him and to judge him fairly, and to execu our judgments, i. e., to act upon them. God has en ved us with the faculty of judgment for this very pu se. It will not be well for us—it could not possib be well for us—when we stand in the upper court om where Christ is Judge, if we fail to do our d in this lower court-room where we are the judges. hat think you of Christ?

Taking One's Stand

SUNDAY, June 18. Eph. 6:14 "Stand therefore." There are some people who never seem to take a stand. They are always changing their ground. You never know where you have them! They shift, and they budge, and they slip, and they slide. Life is just a dodging of difficulties and never a magnificent facing of the foe. In these high and spiritual matters the folk who yield an inch will soon surrender a mile. They are swayed by loose opinions and not by fixed convictions. Or perhaps they are moved by sentiments and not by ideals. A comfortable feeling is more to be desired than a holy war. And they do not know anything important enough to warrant the shedding of their blood. To them there is nothing more precious than quietness. Emblazoned on their dainty, picnic banner is the legend, "Anything for a quiet life!" And anything means indefinite surrender. While on Jesus' blood-red banner are the burning words, "Anything for a right life!" And anything means not only the yielding of comfort, but the offering up of life itself! It is the people who never take their stand who tend to emasculate the strength of a nation; and it is the same people who are accountable for any softness in the militant Church of Christ.

King Charles' soldiers said of George Fox: "He is as stiff as a tree and as pure as a bell!" It was a magnificent eulogy. George Fox could not be bent or twisted by the fiercest and most cruel antagonisms. His enemies tried it in a score of prisons. They could beat and bruise and harm his body, but they could not decoy his soul from its loyalty to the Lord. He would not swerve. He had taken his stand. He was immovable. Yes, indeed, he was "as stiff as a tree," one of the trees of the Lord, the planting of the Lord that he might be glorified.

Now George Fox's noble stiffness was the companion of a radiant purity. Perhaps it would be nearer the truth to say that the stiffness was more than the companion of the purity; it was its child. He was stiff as a tree just because he was pure as a bell. Purity always breeds strength. Impurity always breeds weakness. When disloyalty steals into our souls the energy begins to leak from our wills. We stand not in the truth when there is no truth in us. When the truth is in us we are the unbribable foes of all iniquity. "His strength was as the strength of ten, because his heart was pure."

And, therefore, the way to make character more robust is by making it more pure. It becomes stable as it becomes clean. We are washed into strength! The blood from Immanuel's veins rids us of both defilement and indifference. The grace which makes the saint makes the hero too. J. H. J.

Our Divine Kinsman

MONDAY, June 19. Job. 19 : 20-29. "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The Hebrew word is "goel," which in the book of Ruth is translated by "near kinsman." What Boaz was to Naomi and Ruth, when the two lonely women got back to Bethlehem, that Jesus is to us. He is our protector, our vindicator, our near kinsman. He will plead our cause and redeem our inheritance, and give us hope and life. This is what Job needed, and by the inspiration of the Divine Spirit he was assured that somewhere his Redeemer was waiting for the opportunity of performing the kinsman's part.

We know how truly these hopes and expectations have been realized by our Lord. Listen to those majestic words: "He, because he abideth forever, hath an indissoluble priesthood"; and, "Having been made perfect, He became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation."

This is what we need. We are misjudged and misunderstood, we feel ourselves the prey and sport of malignant spirits, it seems as though Providence were against us, as against Job. Like him we cry out, "Have pity, friends, for the hand of God hath touched us." And then Jesus seems to stand beside us, saying, "Fear not, I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine." The rivers shall not overflow, and the fire shall consume only the bonds that bind. Nothing shall separate us from our kinsman's love, and there is no sacrifice which he is not prepared to make on our behalf. The telescope, with its sweep of the worlds in space, and the microscope, that reveals the worlds in a globule of water, combine to set forth the glories of Jesus, that though he made the worlds, yet "He loved me and gave himself for me." Because he lives we shall live also. F. B. M.

Are We Making Spiritual Progress?

TUESDAY, June 20. Rev. 21:5. "And he that sitteth on the throne said, Behold, I make all things new." Shortly before the beginning of the European war, I was making a tour in North Africa, which country had always been associated in my mind with camel trains, Arabs and a waste of desert. In this case as it so frequently happens, my pre-impressions were shattered somewhat as I was whirled from Algiers to Old Biskra in a first-class express train, surrounded with all the marks of modern civilization. But at Biskra, indeed, on the edge of the great Sahara's sea of sand, there certainly would be little to remind of the life of the new and changing world. Imagine my surprise when on my first day's journey into the desert with a caravan, a whirring was heard overhead and looking up, I saw a French aeroplane swiftly winging its way straight toward the heart of the desert. The old camel I was riding looked up curiously, as though he would say, "Have you come here also to supplant me?"

It is an age of new things. "The old order changeth." The East is rushing to meet the Western world. Material and scientific invention revolutionize the most ancient customs. Industrial progress is well-nigh a miracle of growth. People are now beginning to think in world terms. "Advance" is the watchword of the nations.

Is our spiritual progress keeping pace with these moving, expanding years? You say, "Look at our great religious organizations!" Yes, but the inner life of the Spirit does not usually renew itself in vast crowds and conventions. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," said Jesus. The new life of religion must spring up in our individual hearts; it is an inner progress, an advance of soul that is needed just now, to match the onward rush of material civilization. Each one can help by making certain that the Kingdom of Love is becoming new daily in one's own life. C. S. C.

Man's Soul a Battle-ground

WEDNESDAY, June 21. Psalm 2 : 1-12. "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." As Calvin puts it: "Of itself, Christ's Kingdom would be quiet, and from thence would issue true peace for the world; but it happens through the default and malice of men, that whenever it raises its head, the world begins to rage and swell against it. But this comfort follows that when the ungodly have mustered all their forces, and when they boast most arrogantly of their multitudes, riches and armies, they find themselves in collision, not merely against the weak and helpless saints, but to be challenging the God of Heaven." Let this be for our comfort, when we see Christ's cause of Peace and Righteousness almost overwhelmed. They cannot succeed. All their attempts shall prove to be in vain. The Apostles saw this clearly enough, when they quoted this Psalm in Acts 4 : 24.

The day of this begetting, Paul tells us in Acts 13 : 33, was that on which Christ rose from the grave. He was the First-born from the dead, and thereby was shown to be the Son of God with power. May we not humbly add that he has also been born in our heart, that he has brought in the life of God, and that he has become the King over the inner realm. There too the self-life rages, and seeks to cast its bands asunder and assert its own supremacy. Satan rages without, persecution assails us, the conflict is stern; but what can all these forces avail against the great power of God, who has set himself to maintain the Empire of Jesus, and bring every thought into subjection.

Be of good cheer, believer! The God of Heaven will secure his own great purposes in your redemption. Your enemies are his enemies. Your soul-life is a battle-ground on which the victory must remain with him. F. B. M.

The Soul's Freedom in Christ

THURSDAY, June 22. Rom. 8:2. "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and death." Paul had experience with two kinds of law, the law of the Jewish prophets, in which he was found "blameless," and later the law of Christ, which he speaks of as the new freedom. The first was the law of Mount Sinai, an outward law, having to do with prohibitions and definite duties; the second was the law of the Sermon on the Mount, an inner law, having to do with positive service to others and loving acts.

Jesus said that he came, not to destroy the old law, but to fulfil it, to fill it up with a new, fresh life from God, born in the atmosphere of doing something and not refraining from doing things. He put Love as a driving force behind Jewish law, and Love became so much more powerful and attractive that law was lost sight of, its slavish demands forgotten. The Gospel gave to law and commandments a new meaning.

The great thing is to get this outside law inside us, to adjust our lives to God's order so truly that his way of looking at things is the very breath of our nature, an instinct with us, an atmosphere in which our duties are lost in pleasures of "helping on the other fellow."

A worker for the poor on the East Side of New York said to me recently, her face glowing with the thought of her work, "The days are so short in which to do all that I want to do over there." She would not have called her service "duty"; it was free and unfettered as Love. C. S. C.

The Psalm of the Cross

FRIDAY, June 23. Psalm 22 : 1-21. This is assuredly the Psalm of the Cross. Our Lord's heart was full of it, during his crucifixion. But there is a profound sense in which we must appropriate it to ourselves, if we have entered into the experience described in the words of the Apostle: "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts," and "I am crucified with Christ."

To the Greek the Cross was foolishness, but to those who are being saved, it is the power of God. In other words: it is only as we take the shame and dying of the Cross to ourselves as a personal experience, that we shall realize the power of God in us for sanctification and on us for service. We are too fond of ourselves, too keen to hear all men speak well of us, too greedy for human praise. We are unwilling to know that our self-life deserves to be treated as a condemned felon. We are quite willing, unlike our Lord, to take any narcotic that can dull or extinguish the mortification of our flesh. This is why our lives are devoid of spiritual power.

Jesus was crucified in weakness, but he liveth through the power of God, and when we are weak in him we shall live with him through the power of God toward all within our reach. Let us put one solemn question to ourselves: Do we know the difference between soul and spirit, between I and not-I, between the old Adam and the new? If so, can we recite the major part of this Psalm as part of our experience along with our crucified Lord! F. B. M.

The Song of Sorrow and the Song of Triumph

SATURDAY, June 24. Matt. 26:30. "And when they had sung a hymn, they went unto the Mount of Olives." The eleven disciples, with Jesus, formed the choir on that memorable night. How that song must have comforted their troubled spirits. Perhaps they sang:

> "Cast thy burden on the Lord and he will sustain thee.
> Comfort ye, comfort ye my people.
> The Lord of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge."

Thousands of martyrs have chanted triumphant songs on their way from prison to the stake and while the body was burning, the soul was wafted on the wings of melody to its everlasting home.

Jesus, on his way to greater suffering than martyrdom, with the weight of a world's guilt on his bosom, could join the disciples in a rapturous processional song, as if marching to victory. Handel, in his Messiah, sings of the Man of Sorrows with wonderful pathos, especially in the words "He is despised—despised and rejected of men, acquainted with grief."

But the mighty Saviour could rise above all his sorrows and sing while he was being wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquities and pouring out his soul unto death. Hear him say, "Father, forgive them; it is finished." "Into Thy hands I commend my Spirit." We may follow his example and while wearing a crown of thorns, sing of the coming crown of glory. The anthem after Calvary will be blessing and honor and glory and power be unto him that sitteth on the throne and unto the Lamb forever and ever. E. W. C.

The Universal Hope

WHAT history will record as the first step toward American mediation in the war has been taken. When President Wilson, on May 27, speaking before the League to Enforce Peace, defined the American attitude, he had in view the fact that the British and German attitudes regarding peace had already been set forth by Sir Edward Grey and Chancellor Hollweg, thus opening the way for an opportune statement of our attitude as the leading neutral nation. (The address in full is given on another page.)

In affirming that "the desire of the whole world is now turning more and more eagerly toward the hope of peace," the President did not exaggerate. He felt that the time had come to announce our position as a nation, and the terms upon which we could assume our share of the responsible work. As the spokesman of the American people, he felt it to be his duty to break the silence and to give expression to the national thought and purpose. "As neighbors to the whole world, we are interested in the welfare of every other nation, and in the establishment of impartial justice. Our sole interest and desire is to assist in bringing about a peace so firmly founded and safeguarded that it may give a reasonable hope of endurance."

When peace comes, it must be based upon the principles of international justice. The jingoes who are now urging the continuance of this futile and destructive war will be silent then, when they behold the spectacle of a world shaking off the ancient delusion of militarism and force. Peace will be the immediate end in view. Everything else will be a matter of detail. And the nation which blocks the progress of peace will assume a weighty responsibility.

How our own "preparedness" advocates, whom Congressman Kitchin, the majority leader in the House of Representatives, has described as being mainly influenced "by hysteria and jingoism," regard the President's outspoken presentation of the nation's peace desire, may be gathered from the sharp criticisms in the militaristic press. They characterize it as an "unfortunate" bid for peace, which will be interpreted abroad as an intrusion of American politics in European affairs; as "electioneering," as impossible of acceptance by the Allies, and much more to the same effect. In the present case, however, it has long been evident that those politicians and newspapers that have been so vociferous for "preparedness," and even for dragging the country into war, do not in any sense represent the national sentiment. Their criticism is breath blown against the wind. This Government is now practically pledged to go forward in its peace programme. Let the President take courage.

Quakers Stand by Their Guns

TO speak of Quakers as standing by their guns may seem incongruous, but the courage Quaker leaders have been displaying in opposing the recent militaristic measures passed by the Now York state legislature is like the courage of the battlefield. At least it is another proof of the falsity of the accusation that pacifists are cowardly.

The Religious Society of Friends, in yearly session at New York recently, unanimously adopted the report of its Peace Committee, deciding "not to comply with the provisions of any law requiring them or their children to submit to military training, either as individuals or in schools controlled or supported by Friends." The resolution further provided "That our meeting houses be made rallying places for campaigns to oppose the militaristic spirit, increase of armament and other warlike preparations; that members join anti-militarist societies and advertise the peace principles of the Society of Friends, announcing their belief in the utter unrighteousness of all war."

The Quakers are not the only persons in New York state who are uniting in a vigorous effort to have the five militaristic laws, characterized by the peace-lovers as "the bloody five," repealed. A number of anti-militaristic organizations met a few days ago at the headquarters of the Woman's Peace Party in New York to band themselves together for this work. An intelligent opponent of the laws expressed the opinion that New York has shown that America can succumb to militarism. "These five laws," this pacifist declared, "are more extreme than those of any nation of Europe, even the most militaristic—and all at a time when the President of the United States says there is no danger of a foreign invasion.

The "Slater Bill," to which particularly strenuous objection is made, provides that all boys between sixteen and nineteen, except those engaged in gainful occupations and those exempted by the Military Commission, receive military training in camps for three weeks every year, under instruction by officers of the National Guard and of the regular army and other instructors to be named by the Commission.

But still more drastic are the two Stivers bills, the first of which gives the Governor power to force all male citizens of the state between the ages of eighteen and forty-five to undergo military drill, and also provides that the Governor may draft citizens for one year's service in the National Guard. Refusal to obey this draft will be equivalent to the crime of desertion from the United States army.

There seems to be strong reason for believing that the bills were jammed through the legislature with altogether unreasonable haste and that the Governor hardly gave sufficient opportunity for those who opposed the bills to express themselves in urging a veto. What will be the result of the vigorous pressure to be brought to bear upon the next legislature for the repeal of these laws remains to be seen.

Meanwhile the Quakers and some others have declared themselves. Whatever opinion other citizens may have on the subject, all must admire the courage of these "Friends," who have dared, in the face of human ordinances, to stand staunchly true to the real teachings of the Prince of Peace.

A Life of Noble Service

ONE of the finest Christian soldiers we have ever known—and it has been our privilege to be personally acquainted with not a few—recently passed away while engaged in a campaign which had occupied his activities for nearly a quarter of a century. His field was among the southern mountaineers and there, through all these years, he had fought a good fight against the forces of sin and spiritual darkness. He had scored many a splendid triumph. His work entailed hardships and there were obstacles without number; but he labored on, each passing year adding to his slender forces and increasing the number of his conquests. Edward O. Guerrant, founder of the Inland Mission, and widely known as the originator and leader of the Soul Winners' League, was a Christian gentleman of a notable type. He was both civilizer and Christianizer. By the simple folk of those bleak uplands—far from civilization and forgotten by the world—he was idolized. He was their pastor, teacher, friend, counselor. But for his great heart and planning brain, they would have continued in the social and spiritual darkness in which their predecessors had lived and died. He found them a brave, kindly, but neglected people. When the Gospel began to light up the mountain valleys, ancient feuds disappeared, long severed friendships were revived, and the mountain dwellers took a new and brighter hold of life. Up to the last day of his life, the old Christian soldier continued to bring others to Christ.

Although little known to the outside world, Dr. Guerrant was a missionary who must be awarded a distinguished place in the love and gratitude of God's people. His splendid example of Christian service should stimulate others to take up the work he founded, and to carry it forward to still greater triumphs.

Catching Up

THE children of this world are still in their generation wiser than the children of light. But the children of light are beginning to catch up. Yet there are a great many excellent Christian people who really seem to think that it would be disloyal to Christ to display the sagacity and the enterprise and the push and pull and determination that characterize successful men of the world.

But to the point. The churches throughout the land are bitterly declaiming against non-attendance. Some of these churches have ceased that useless clamor, and have begun to proclaim church advantages. In other words, they have begun to advertise. They have begun to utilize publicity. There isn't a welfare movement or any other kind of movement that is succeeding in the world today that has not depended from the word go on publicity in advertising. And these churches that have wakened up to this fact are beginning to reap the sure reward. And they want all the other churches in the land to know what they are doing. The time has arrived for a thorough discussion of the whole subject of church advertising. The Associated Ad Clubs of the World holds a convention of several days duration in Philadelphia at the end of June. All day of Tuesday, June 27, and all of the afternoon of Wednesday, June 28, there will be departmental conferences on church publicity in connection with this convention. A score of experts in this field of church work will address these conferences.

With an open mind as to ways and means by which the church should advertise its work, w nre servedly recommend to the churches of Ameri that they send their pastors or other representati s as delegates to this important conference in Philad phia. A special committee is in charge, headed by Rev. Christian F. Reisner, of New York, who has ass ated with himself Rev. Lincoln F. Caswell, of Flushing .Y. and others. Besides the addresses and open um there will be what is probably the first exhibi n of church advertising methods. A program of hese conferences will be found elsewhere in this num r o the Christian Herald.

A Great American

JAMES JEROME HILL, the last of the gr de-velopers of the America of today, after a e of prodigious activity and amazing results, ssed away at St. Paul on May 29, in the heart the "North-West Empire" which his genius had c ted. His career was singularly free from those ble shes which usually mark the progress of empire-bu lers. Beginning with scanty education but with an erv-ant mind, a stubbornly optimistic energy su ient to overcome any obstacle, and a knowledge tha grew steadily with experience, he had a constantly wi ning vision of the development of the country's ural resources that led him far ahead of the men his time. He foresaw the tremendous possibiliti th must follow the opening up of vast territories Hi dream of continent wide transportation was ull realized. It was a life work to which he gave t be of his years and his great talents, and he had t sa isfaction of seeing it practically completed bef could dull his vigor. The 6,000 miles of railr h built remain an enduring monument to his gen .

Mr. Hill's career is another illustration of th ac so frequently demonstrated, that the seeds true greatness are to be found rather in individual ch cter and clear, resolute purpose, than in intellect ac-quirement. His whole career was educative He spared no effort to gather information at first and, and whatever he set out to do, he did thoro hly. He was a great book-lover, and read wisely an vell. In forest, on mountainside or plain, he could ays learn something that was worth while. In th reat farming sections he studied the problems of t pio-neer agriculturists and their solution. His wide sion could see across the wilderness, and he knew tha here could be found a way to make it blossom prof bly. He was never a speculator, yet thousands pinne heir faith on his judgment, and his sagacious fo ight and business-like "preparedness" took acco o every contingency. The result was success, far-reaching and so uniform that it stands out as a m nif-icent example of what thoroughness and con va-tism, combined with vision, can accomplish. H work belongs to the whole nation.

An Introduction

SOME work of the first class has been app ring in the Christian Herald the last year or tw the authorship of which may not be quite cer n in the minds of our readers. Remington Schu r is a rare combination of artist and author. You ave read some remarkable things by him that we un-signed. The "Bottle" series of nine picture with their dramatic tale of contrasts were produced, aw-ings and text, by Mr. Schuyler. The beautiful int-ing which was made the subject of this year's Ch tian Herald calendar was by this artist. These a but examples of his work in the Christian Heral On page 724 of this issue will be found other exa les.

We have sent Mr. Schuyler abroad in the l d to write and to paint the story of the human art. In his journeyings, Mr. Schuyler will doubtless ock at the door of many a Christian Herald reader. We bespeak for him the wide-open door of we me. You may receive him with perfect confidenc and talk to him in entire freedom. He will want t earn what your problems are and how you solved ent, so that others who have similar problems may earn how to conquer. He will be glad to know wha our unsolved problems are, for it may be he will ha the solution gleaned from other lives. You will fin him a sympathetic and an interesting visitor. He nts to be of help to every reader of this paper. We ask that every reader in whose home he com wil help him help the rest.

Sunken Ship in Tunnel

THE men at work driving the new subway tunnel under the East River, had their progress temporarily retarded because the tun l shoved into an old wooden ship. Th vessel was encountered on the Br klyn side of the Old Slip-Clark Str t tunnel. The engineers ventured the pinion that the ship must have fou ered about 100 years ago. The sid are incrusted with barnacles, and the raft lies in the mud of the river bot m at a depth of about twenty-four fee eneath the present bed of e river. It is loaded wit some kind of ore, most like tin or lead. Those ma ng the find said they wer certain it is not gold. Th obstruction will cause onl a temporary halt in the pro ess, which is nine feet a day both north and south tub. The tunnel is now abo 300 feet from the pul ead line on the Brookyn de. There are snags in the iver of time near the sur e to tear holes in hum n hulls. The strait and arrow way is full of ob acles; by divine stre gth they are overcome. Jes Christ imparts that stre gth: "For whosoever is bor of God overcometh the wor, and this is the victory tha vercometh the world, even our ith." (I John 5 : 4.) th Anniversary

THE Marble Collegiate Reformed Church of Ne York City has just cel ated the twenty-fifth ann ersary of the pastorate of r. David James Burrell Several days were devot to the celebration. An ttractive program was car d out, and the climax wa reached in a great uni meeting in the church on nday night, May 21, par ipated in by pastors and ongregations of a number f Reformed Churches, at hich Dr. Burrell pre hed. The celebration inc led fitting resolutions of preciation, and tokens of ffection. During his mi try 1744 persons have ent ed into membership in th church. Dr. Burrell ca to New York from the W minster Presbyterian Church of Mi eapolis. He announced at the beginn g of his pastorate that, "The Go el is common sense, and if it is pre nted to the common sense of the pe e, it will be approved and accepted. His ministry is abundant proof of e soundness of this foundation. In 912 Dr. Burrell was elected president of the World's Alliance of Refor ed and Presbyterian Churches. Th ugh his sermons printed from time to me in the Christian Herald, Dr. Bu ell has included the Christian He ld family in his parish and we gla y join with his more immediate pa h in this recognition of his work.

e pastor's personal integrity, home lif warm affection, unselfish devotion to thers, his all-daring courage in fig ng wrong, his work in saving souls are ll in the make-up of the man which jus y the celebration and respect and lov that prompted it. This spirit of the ap le was in his mind when he began his inistry in the Metropolis: "For I det mined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." (I Cor. 2 : 2.)

Sang at Father's Grave

LARRY DIELMAN of Emmonsburg, Md., went to the cemetery before day every Christmas for thirty years, and just at dawn he stood at his father's grave and with a splendid voice sang a beautiful Christmas carol. His father had been professor of music in the university in his home town, and being a devout Christian as well as skilled musician, the son observed the custom as a memorial of his own faith and hope in the future, and love for his father. The song was not sung for the repose of the soul of his father, but in faith in his immortality. Recently Mr. Dielman suffered a stroke of paralysis and will likely never visit the cemetery again on Christmas dawn, but most probably soon will go to join his father in singing the anthem of praise to "Our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." (II Tim. 1 : 10.)

Medical Congress Meets

FIVE hundred prominent medical and surgical specialists from all parts of the United States met in Washington on May 9 for a three days' session of the Congress of American Physicians and Surgeons, with Dr. William S. Thayer of Baltimore in the chair. In connection with the congress, fourteen medical and surgical societies held their annual sessions. Papers were read and addresses made by acknowledged specialists covering every phase of scientific medical progress throughout the world. The medical profession is one of the highest callings on earth. Physicians and surgeons charge reasonably good fees, as they have a right to, and as a rule are prudent and thrifty in their provision for the future. But in easing pain, curing disease, and saving life they render a service which cannot rightly be measured solely by dollars and cents. Their calling is one of frequent heroism. They take their lives in their hands every time they treat a person with a deadly disease. With all their knowledge of science, with all of their precaution, some of them die every year as martyrs to their profession, even as did the Great Physician of souls, of whom it was said in derision, but with truth: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." (Matt. 27 : 42.)

Horace Greeley's School

JOHN BACON, superintendent of schools for the town of Amherst in New Hampshire, visited a school recently and, calling the children to him, asked them what their schoolhouse needed to improve its condition. One boy said it needed to be painted, another that new shingles ought to be put on the roof, another that the grounds ought to be fixed. The superintendent said nothing about his intention, but went off and bought white lead, oil, buckets, paintbrushes, hammers, saws, shingles, clapboards, nails, shovels and other articles, and set the children themselves to do the work of shingling the roof, fixing the gutters, painting the house and beautifying the grounds. It is surprising to know what a good job the young mechanics did. It did not look like the same house or place. The work of the children was as good for the children as it was for the building. It is a fine thing to set the children at a task that is worth while, and in the interest of a cause of supreme value. The little school at Amherst has a greater distinction than that of having enterprising scholars repair its building; it is that of having given to the son of a poor farmer his first lessons, and start in life. Horace Greeley, who walked into New York City as a journeyman printer with his wardrobe tied up in a large handkerchief hung on a stick over his shoulder and afterward founded the New York Tribune, became a national figure as a journalist, lecturer, and enemy of slavery, and candidate for the presidency. The little country school at Amherst shook the whole nation with mental and moral dynamite. God be thanked for the country school, for the school anywhere, the strong foundation stone of state and church. The systematic instruction of the Hebrew child in mental, moral and religious truth was obligatory: "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children." (Deut. 7 : 6.)

Crossing Continent in "Schoonermobile"

EZRA MEEKER, eighty-five years old, started from Washington, D. C., recently in an old-fashioned long covered wagon, called a "schooner" in pioneer days, on a trip across the continent to Olympia, Wash., a distance of 3560 miles. The old man had already made three trips over the Oregon trail, but he concluded he would like to make the fourth in better time. So he fitted himself out with a huge "schooner" with an automobile motor. And instead of dragging along with an ox team as in the other journeys, he is sailing along happy as a bird in his machine. The octogenarian is not out simply on a trip of recreation; he is mixing some business with his pleasure. This business is indicated by this sign which decorates the vehicle: "To retrace the Cumberland Road and the Oregon Trail and to report to Congress conditions and the probable cost of building a national transcontinental military highway, is the object af this journey." What a difference Mr. Meeker will find between the journey he is now making and the one he first made when he was a young man. The long, lonely, uninhabited spaces he saw on his first trip are filled with villages and populous cities. No cold chills will run up and down his back, as they did the first time in terror of the red man. Vast regions of monotonous waste, hunting grounds that had never felt the touch of a plow, are now beautiful fertile farms provided with the most improved implements, and surrounded by every evidence of comfort and culture. The trip of the old man of four score years and five across the continent in the interest of science and civilization is a symbol of the journey of life we are making amidst the hum of industry, the laughs of joy, the cries of sorrow, over rough roads, across broad rivers, over rugged mountains and on to the eternal Pacific, the peaceful sea. There is this reference to a journey across the wilderness to the promised land, the type of heaven: "We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said I will give it you: come thou with us and we will do thee good." (Num 10 : 29.)

Argentina's Growth

THE last census just published fixes the population of the Argentine Republic at 7,883,287. The census of 1895 gave the population as 3,954,911, so that the record shows almost a doubling of the inhabitants in the past twenty years. Buenos Aires is a large and beautiful city with a population of 1,375,814, about half as many as all of Argentina had twenty years ago. The fertile soil, the form of government, the encouragement to industry, the improvement in education, the freedom in religion, have attracted a large number of enterprising citizens from all parts of the world. Of Argentina can be said that which was spoken of a nation of old: "Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people." (Deut. 4 : 6.)

Girl Victim of Cabarets

HELEN, fourteen years old, a poor little creature daubed with paint and powder, was found on the pavement in Chicago, a bottle from which she had drunk poison near her. As the policeman lifted her up she said faintly, "I spent all my money on cabarets and I was afraid to go home." Helen worked in a book bindery and took her money home to her mother. Then she fell into bad company, and made the rounds of the resorts of temptation and soon came to the pavement and poison bottle. How beautiful in the Y. W. C. A. and rescue missions to save these girls from ruin. No punishment is too severe for the men or institutions that would start young girls on their downward course. Of them it can be said: "They catch them in their net, and gather them in their drag." (Hab. 1 : 15.)

A Pioneer Sets Forth

True Stuff by
REMINGTON SCHUYLER

"THE farm had been 'tenanted' for a number of years, previous to its coming into my possession; during which time it had been much abused, the fences and out-buildings suffered to go to decay, the majority of fields overrun with noxious weeds, very difficult to destroy; so that I may be said to have commenced under the lash, the study and practice of farming."

A hundred years ago, this letter was written by a farmer, my great grandfather. Yet how truly his statements might apply to many a "run-down" farm today.

Disgusted by what he called "those anxieties so frequently produced by the uncertain issue of a commercial speculation," he had, after consultation with his wife, given up business in New York City, and begun life again as a farmer on the shores of Seneca Lake, New York state.

I have often thought what an adventure this was, for that great grandfather and his faithful wife.

Descended from a long line of Dutch land-holders, reared in the luxury of city life, accustomed to all the refinements of living; yet he went forth into a new country and met nature halfway and won.

What was his secret?

Agriculture was to him a science.

He did not become a mere "tiller of the soil."

He spent a certain sum on books.

He encouraged every intellectual effort made in the neighborhood.

He tried all improvements and steadily advocated the use of machinery in farming.

He taught his boys to be good farmers.

He helped found a college at Geneva, so that his children (and there were twelve) might have liberal educations.

This comprises the record of a man and his wife who started life over agai n a "run-down" farm one hundred years ago.

How similar it is in many respects to what other "pioneers" are accomplish g in this age.

Then, all the improvements which have since come into farm life, were unk wn. At that time there was no refrigerator car service, no parcel post, no gas engin and only vague rudimentary machinery.

Yet these two "pioneers" won in this adventure by "scientific farming."

THE earliest recollection I have of my grandfather (one son of these pionee the Right Reverend Montgomery Schuyler, D.D., Dean of Christ Church (Epis al) Cathedral at St. Louis, is of seeing him at dawn, tending his large beautifull ept gardens that surrounded his home in St. Louis. At that time he was eighty yea old. Strong, sturdy, beloved by all, yet he had been raised a farmer boy. He had kno the "trick of the plow" in his boyhood days. I remember his speaking with pride o me. fields he had often ploughed.

TODAY, one hundred years since my great grandfather and his wife went rth from New York City as pioneers in the field of "scientific farming," the c has come to me, to go out into the farming sections.

To see and record the adventures of the farmers of this new generation.

To find out the ambitions and ideals of the boys.

To discover the problems of the fathers, the mothers, and the children.

To note the progress of a century of "scientific farming."

A Thought About Service

WHAT if Daniel Boone had said, "I'm sick of this Kentucky Wilderness, I'm tired of this continual struggle with the elements and with pesky Indians. I'm going to quit, and head for New York or Philadelphia, where a man's got a chance to take things easy once in a while; where a fellow can see a few shows and lots of people. I'm going to go and have a good time on Bowling Green and Independence Square."

What if he had said these things, and then quit that special job of his of pioneering?

Well, the opening of that country would have been postponed ten, twenty, or thirty years, perhaps, until some other pioneer arose from the people to lead the way.

And, instead of thrilling over those marvelous exploits of Dan's, we would have had some other name to remember.

Dan would have disappeared into the crowded city life and been lost as a great pioneer.

Because he was swift and tireless he might have gotten a job as messenger boy. Because he was strong and sturdy, he might have become a good porter, or tended some gentleman's horses. Some such job, perhaps. Or because he was resourceful and had tremendous ability, he might have achieved something better.

But why guess what might have happened?

He did not quit. He stuck to his job. Sometimes it was not always easy, this pioneering, this pushing out into uncharted primeval forests; through trackless wastes; or down unknown rivers, but Dan kept at it year in, year out.

And the result? Well he opened up thousands of miles of country to those who followed the glorious pathway he pointed out.

We know Dan's name all right, Daniel Boone of Kentucky. How many know the names of the men who tagged along behind him?

WHEN I was a boy, I liked high mountains. Unless they rose sheer into the air, tens of thousands of feet, and were topped with snow, they scarcely stirred me. Most of my earliest paintings were Indians trailing along or hanging over stupendous ledges of rock.

The Catskill Mountains when I first glimpsed them, disappointed me keenly. They looked like little hills, meager, uninspiring. Because my mind had been trained to think only in terms of snow-topped ridges.

Ten years have passed since that first view of the Catskills. In this time I have learned to love those "little round-topped hills" with a great affection.

Often they have inspired me with feelings as profound as have any snow-crowned summits. And I have seen the Alps.

The outlines of these "little hills" may not be as theatrical or chaotic as the Rockies, but there is a simple grandeur, a quiet dignity, an impressive solidity that grows on one. It isn't the glitter of distant peaks alone that can inspire one.

NOW my farmer friends, be you boys or men, how about that "little farm" you're living on? Are the glittering peaks of the city beckoning you? Or aren't you inspired at all?

I know life seems kind of "hum-drum" and full of toil, and effort day in, day out. I know the ci cal comes strong to you. I realize that many pl think the days of romance are gone. That o i the glittering cities can one find a semblance th glamour of life as it used to be.

In every community, whether it be small or g there is the chance for a great romance, a chan for some real pioneer to develop. A chance for ery determined man or boy to succeed.

The man or boy who will apply himself to stu ing from a scientific, dependable viewpoint, this ro nce of farming, will find opportunities for pione ng right on the "old-home farm," right in hi wn "hum-drum" community.

He will gain not only an assurance and the lity to meet all the problems that arise, but wil in his time so filled with pleasant research and fi tful experiment, that any left-over city longing wi disappear.

In the country he can keep his freedom and de pendence and be a man. A true man.

Remember this curious fact, the country ca get along without the cities, but the cities are depe en on the country.

I know that you all would rather be producers han parasites. You would rather be "Daniel Bo es" and pioneers than to be "James! come here!" a le someone else do your thinking.

I'M going to look you up and talk things ove it you on this trip of mine. Be ready for me.

The man who sees the world through a heart fille wi goodness will see lots of it in the world.

Two Thousand Baptists in Convention

By REV. CURTIS LEE LAWS, D.D.

THE last session of the Northern Baptist Convention is always by common consent "the best convention ever held." The tw -cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, by their generous hospitality, made th recent Convention a constant delig to all who were present. A "welco" met us upon every hand. The ch hes welcomed us into their pulpits, th people welcomed us into homes and on e afternoon put two hundred automo les at our service for a pleasure trip. A l al bank opened an office at the Conve ion hall for the cashing of checks. 'vo thousand Baptists spent from M 17 to May 25 in Minneapolis, revi ing the work of the past year and pl ning the work of the coming year. Th Convention is composed of five in pendent and autonomous cooperati missionary societies, societies ch ged with doing the missionary work of he Northern Baptists. It repre ser about 13,000 churches with 1,500,-00 members. Up to six years ago the so ties had no other bond of union th good will and fraternity. They me for their anniversaries at the same ti and place, but there was no formal co eration, except as to program. N the societies, while holding to their au nomy, have become cooperating so ties in the Convention. The expe iment has proved a great success, an there is a growing solidarity and a gr ing sense of responsibility and po r.

he Convention is not a legislative bo , and hence there is no discussion of doctrine or polity except as such matters arise in the discussion of our missionary responsibility and our missionary methods. There is as distinct a cleavage along doctrinal lines among Baptists as was manifest in the Presbyterian Assembly at Atlantic City, but such cleavage has no opportunity to manifest itself in our conventions. A great placard above the stage emphasized the following as the motto of the Minneapolis Convention: "Let us get together by working together and praying together."

ALL the societies closed the year without debt, and over this result there was great rejoicing. For its missionary work and educational work the denomination raised last year $4,757,556, a gain over the preceding year of $1,388,150. This announcement was hailed with great delight, and coming early in the session it struck a note of optimism for all the sessions following. A year ago the Convention adopted a "five year program" outlining large things in evangelism, educational work and missionary work. This program, which was but a dream a year ago, has now become a serious working program. That the splendid goal will be reached within the five years there is no reason to doubt. A committee of thirty-five representatives of all the societies and of all parts of the Convention's territory will push the work of the "five year program" with increased enthusiasm during the coming year.

There has been a growing discontent concerning a duplication of Home Mission work resulting from the fact that the Home Mission Society and the Publication Society are both operating in the same territory. There has been some confusion and some misunderstanding. The Home Mission Society has charge of the mission churches and is responsible for them, but the Publication Society has charge of the colporteurs and the chapel cars; and often the splendid work of the colporteurs and the chapel cars results in the establishment of churches! At the Los Angeles Convention a year ago this was the vital issue. Both societies are doing their work well, but all sensible people see that work must not be duplicated, and that friction must be avoided. With absolute unanimity the Minneapolis convention passed a resolution the first clause of which is as follows:

> RESOLVED: That the Northern Baptist Convention hereby records its deliberate judgment that the missionary work of the American Baptist Publication Society and that of the American Baptist Home Mission Society should be united under one administration at the earliest practicable time.

A Committee of eleven was appointed, charged with carrying this resolution into effect, and thus was settled one of the most difficult problems which we have had to face.

FIFTEEN per cent. was added to the budgets of the cooperating societies for the coming year, and the apportionments will be increased to that extent. There is a general feeling that we have been playing at Missions and that we ought to be giving millions where we are now giving hundreds of thousands. The plan is to increase the budget gradually, probably fifteen per cent. each year.

The challenge of Latin America rang out clear and strong. Northern Baptists have confined their missionary work very largely to the Orient, but there is now a wide-spread feeling that we ought to begin work in South America, where the conditions are lamentable and where the need is so great. Some of us are cherishing the hope that some individual, princely giver, or some group of princely givers, may come forward with special gifts toward the redemption of Latin America, that we may not be forced to wait for years before entering the continent of golden opportunity.

The President, Dean Shailer Mathews, was a remarkable presiding officer. Keen, alert, genial and witty, he kept things moving and moving good-naturedly. He will be succeeded in the presidency by Dr. Clarence A. Barbour, President of Rochester Seminary, who is also a great leader in the denomination. The Convention gathered our representative people from every state in our territory. This is all the more remarkable when we realize that unlike the Presbyterians and Methodists our delegates have to come to conventions at their own charges. The next convention will meet a year hence at Cleveland, Ohio.

The Methodist General Conference

By WILLARD PRICE

Completing the Account of the Saratoga Convention, Begun in Last Week's Issue of the Christian Herald

THE millions of Methodism have been placed back of the proposal for a World League to enforce peace. A resolution ad ted by the Methodist Episcopal Ge ral Conference, which has just elc d its sessions at Saratoga, reads in pa as follows:

> express our conviction that the time is rip or the United States of America to take th ead in the establishment of a league or fed ation of nations which shall be so consti ed, sustained, empowered and operated as protect weak peoples from outrage, and res in strong peoples from breaking the pe of the world. . . .
> recommend: That the Federated Council Churches of Christ in America be requ ed to arrange for a Council of Churches to et at the time and place of the European pe conference to devise plans for the re blishment of cooperation and the more co lete articulation of righteousness and pe , and the advancement of the Kingdom of aven on earth.
> also recommend. That our membership in e Federated Council of Churches of Ch t in America be authorized to provide for representation of the Methodist Episcopal Ch ch in such Council.

A World Church for a World Job

FACED by a world task the like of which has never before confronted M hodism, the General Conference of th Church has adopted a great "World P ram."

here is a religious wave around the w d and hundreds of thousands are se ing admission to the already cr ded churches and schools on the fo gn field. The opportunity is the gr test in the history of the Church, an it is to meet this situation that a W ld Program has been devised.

The time has come," states the re rt, as adopted, "for us to think of ou as a world wide Church and not m ely as a national Church with missi s in foreign lands."

he Board of Foreign Missions is au orized to set aside the years 1918-1919 for the centenary celebration of the founding of Methodist missionary work. During these years it is planned to double the missionary income, to create a permanent endowment fund of large magnitude and to cooperate with the Methodist Episcopal Church South in plans for increasing the scope of missionary work abroad.

Born, Married and Buried

DEFINITE action was taken by this Conference on the question of original sin, as follows:

The Committee on Revision made many changes in the Ritual, one of them being the omission from the baptism service of the words: "Forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin."

The words "Holy Ghost" wherever they appeared in the Ritual were changed to "Holy Spirit."

In the service for the solemnization of matrimony the questions asked of the bride and groom are made exactly the same. The words "with my worldly goods I thee endow" caused some discussion. They were omitted by the Committee on Revision but were later reinserted by action of the Board of Bishops.

Of course, the word "obey" was dropped years ago and although there were a few, I am sorry to say, who would have liked to see it put back on its pedestal it was "left dropped."

It is now legal for anyone, saint or sinner, to partake of the Lord's Supper. This Conference has discarded the old direction:

"No person shall be admitted to the Lord's Supper among us who is guilty of any practice for which we would exclude a member of our Church."

In the burial service the disagreeable and gruesome phrase: "though after my skin worms destroy this body," has been omitted and various messages of comfort and hope have taken its place.

Woman Suffrage Endorsed

A FLAT footed position in favor of Woman Suffrage has been taken by the Church. The following resolution was adopted by an overwhelming vote:

> Whereas in the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church women have always been loyal and faithful workers, and
> Whereas we recognize that Christian wives and mothers should be given an opportunity to assist in the great work of introducing into politics more of the true spirit of practical Christianity, and
> Whereas the Methodist Episcopal Church has always stood for justice and righteousness in social and political life,
> Resolved, therefore, that we, the delegates to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assert our belief in the justice and righteousness of granting the women the political franchise.

A SPIRITED effort was made to relax the strict rules of the Discipline regarding amusements. The effort was defeated by a large vote. That means that the Church Discipline still prohibits "dancing, playing at games of chance, attending theaters, horse-races, circuses, dancing parties, or patronizing dancing schools, or taking such other amusements as are obviously of misleading or questionable moral tendency."

The unanimous approval of the Conference was given to the Uniform Marriage Act, proposed by the American Bar Association. The main features of this Act for which the Church now stands sponsor are:

The abolition in all States of the Common Law marriage.

A lapse of time between the application for a marriage license and the issuance thereof, and a proper publicity with a view to prevention of elopements.

An affidavit of health showing freedom from vicious diseases.

Recognition of the labor unions was formally made by the Conference by the addition of the following phrase to the Social Creed of the Church:

"The right of employees and employers alike to organize."

To Present a United Front

THERE was a strong movement in favor of the unification of all the benevolent Boards of the Church. This would have meant that the Boards of Sunday Schools, Foreign Missions, Home Missions, Education, etc., would all have been consolidated into one Board.

Although this was not done, the Conference did authorize what will be called an "Inter-Board Conference," which will be a sort of federation committee made up of representatives from all the Boards. Its duty will be to correlate the various lines of work so that the benevolent branches of the Church will present a more united front than in the past.

The present Secretaries and Editors of the Church were in most cases reelected. Some changes, however, were made.

In the reorganization of the Board of Home Missions it was decided to place the Board in the control of one Secretary rather than three as in the past. D. D. Forsyth was elected Secretary.

A. W. Harris was made Secretary of the Board of Education in the place of Thomas Nicholson who had been elected a Bishop. The election of W. F. Oldham to the Episcopacy left only two Secretaries for the Board of Foreign Missions and it was voted to leave the Board under the direction of these two Secretaries without electing a third.

(The names of the newly elected bishops, with some account of their previous activities, appeared in our last week's issue. Of the new bishops, Bishop Oldham has been assigned to South America and Bishop Herbert Welch to Korea, the other remaining in the homeland. We also published then a picture of the Missionary Bishops at

To the Klondike by Rail

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just taken a trip over the first railway line ever built in Alaska. This is "the White Pass," which runs from Skagway over the Coast Range to White Horse, at the headwaters of the Yukon. The road was built when the Klondike gold excitement was at its height. It was to carry passengers over the mountains to where they could get ship for Dawson. The work was begun in 1898 and finished less than two years later, when the first passenger train, a line of flat cars, brought out gold dust to the amount of $2,000,000.

The White Pass Railway is only 111 miles long, and although not as expensive as the Copper River road, belonging to the Guggenheims, it cost millions to build. The first twenty miles cost on the average more than $100,000 per mile, and there are parts of the track which cost half as much more. During the construction 3,500 men were employed, and less than thirty of these died or were killed while the railroad was building. The work went on right through the winter, and within eighteen months after the first pick was used the trains were carrying thousands of passengers and millions of dollars' worth of freight down the seacoast.

The White Pass Railway begins at Skagway, the port at the head of the Lynn Canal, just about 1,000 miles from Seattle. Its path is cut through the rocks along the winding valley of the Skagway River and up the steep slope of the Coast Range of mountains. Here and there the track hangs to the sides of cliffs so steep that the workmen had to be hung in slings from above that they might drill and blast out the ledges on which the road runs. In places whole cliffs were thrown down to make a place for the roadbed.

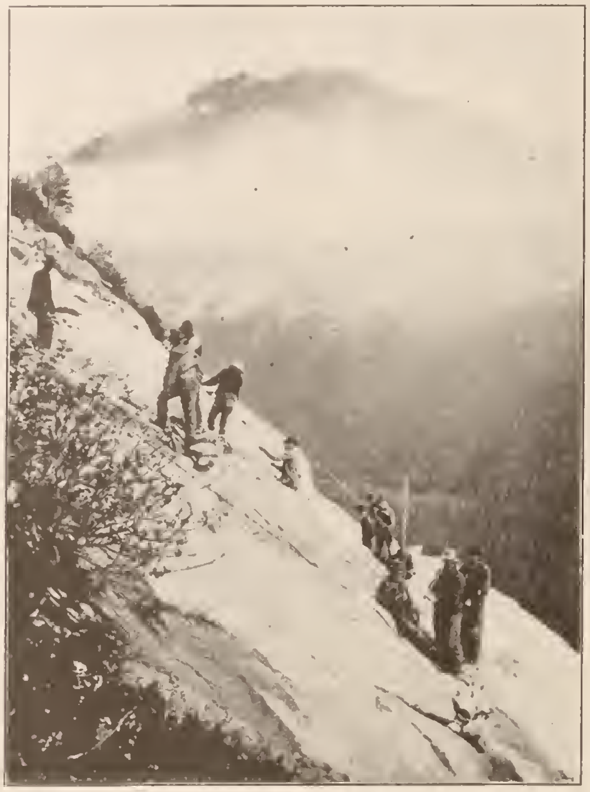
After reaching the top of the pass the track runs for twenty-seven miles along the winding shores of Lake Bennett. It crosses a canyon 215 feet high upon a great bridge of steel. It skirts the White Horse Rapids, so famous in the days of the Klondike, and finally ends at White Horse, 350 miles from Dawson by the Overland trail and more than 100 miles more by the river.

The usual tourist trip of Alaska is confined to the islands of the southeastern part of the territory. It ends at Skagway, and many travelers make the excursion to the summit of the White Pass and return during the stay of the steamer. So far very few have gone on into Dawson, and those who make the long trip down the Yukon to Nome are fewer still. The round trip fare to the summit of the White Pass is $500, and it costs about $130 for the passage down the Yukon to Nome, where steamers may be had which will take one across Bering Sea and the Pacific down to Seattle. The White Pass Railway controls the rail and river transportation all the way from Skagway to Nome.

THE road was well planned and well built. It has been well managed from the start, and notwithstanding the heavy snowfalls, it has, for the most of the time, been kept open throughout the winter. It has rotary snow plows attached to the engines which will cut a path twelve feet deep through the drifts, and its administration is such that all slides are quickly repaired.

The accidents that occurred during the building of the road were few. At one place an engine jumped over the cliffs, but the men raised it with block and tackle, and it is still doing its work. At another place, now marked by an iron cross perhaps two feet in height, a rock weighing more than 100 tons fell from the side of the mountain and crushed two workmen who were blasting the way for the track. The rock was so heavy that it could not be moved, and the monument has been sunk in its center.

The builder of the road was Michael J. Heney, who afterward constructed the Copper River Railway for the Guggenheim syndicate. Heney was an expert engineer and a master in the handling of men. He had an iron nerve and would not allow liquor or gambling inside his camp. At one time a desperado belonging to Soapy Smith's gang set up a gambling saloon in a tent close to the route. When Heney ordered him to go away he refused. Heney then turned to his camp foreman, and, pointing to a rock half as big as a house that hung over the tent of the saloonist, told him in the hearing of the gambler to blast that rock out of the way by 5 o'clock the next morning. The gambler thought that this was only a bluff to make him move and did nothing. That night he slept in the tent. At five minutes to 5 o'clock the next morning the foreman came and told him he must get up and leave or he would be killed by the rock. "I shall order my men to touch off the time fuse within sixty seconds. The fuse will burn one minute only, when that rock will rise and crush you to death in this tent."



Building the railroad. The men had to be tied with ropes to keep them from falling

The foreman then ordered "fire" and ran for the shelter. Ten seconds later the gambler rushed after him with his shirt flapping against his bare leg H continued to go, and when last seen was on th ead run down the trail.

BUT come with me and take a ride over th th first railroad of Alaska. The cars are comfo ble and we shall have moving pictures of magn en scenery all the way up the mountains. We sho ou of Skagway into a canyon through which a r in glacial river flows. We skirt this for a mile or climbing the hills, and pass on the way some log in which the old-timers tell us belonged to a w nicknamed Liarsville, because no one who lived er could tell the truth.

Great beds of red flowers line the railway, and es are to be found all the way to the top. There ar e on the lowland, and everywhere the vegetat green. Passing onward, the road climbs up the de of the cliffs. It winds about in horseshoe curve an its steepness is such that it climbs 2,900 feet or reaching the top. This is 400 feet more than b the highest altitude on the new road to Fair k. The White Pass makes its great climb within t nt miles, and it has only one tunnel along its whole te

As you go up the mountains, the climate r dl changes. You have a half dozen climates hi twenty miles. Now and then you get a breeze f n glacier, and as Jack Frost travels on the wings th wind over the perpetual ice, his breath sends hil to your bones. This is perceptible as you cro the canyon and catch the cold air of the Muir G ier, far away. This whole region was once a great cia garden. You can see glaciers in Skagway, and er are glaciers here and there on the sides of the u tains along the railroad. I saw one with a thr silver falling down the green slope below it. A tl lower the thread had swelled to a rope. Lower ll i had become a great cable, and it ended in the fo in Skagway River, dashing down over the rocks th sea.

Passing over the mountains of the Coast ge you come into a new country as far as the chara r o the air is concerned. Skagway is as moist as ge Sound, while White Horse is as dry as Denve I Southeastern Alaska it rains almost every day nd the soil is like a wet sponge. Once over the pas o are in a region which has not had a bit of rainf fo months. The country is as dry as a bone, a i midsummer as hot as the Sahara. There are fre en forest fires. As we climbed to the top of the pa w saw thousands of acres ablaze, and there were b ned forests on the sides of the mountains.

There is plenty of soil on the northern slope th range, and at first sight the country would seem b excellent for farming. I am told that it is not. The soil is sand on a bed of gravel, and the rain n through and is lost. Farther north the soil cha ges, but the air grows dryer, and the climate is like t of our Rocky mountain plateau. In fact, Alask s world as to climate, and in speaking of it it is i ossible to compare it with any one region.

IN traveling from Skagway to the tops of the untains the vegetation shows the changes o the climate according to 'altitude. We start in a co try covered with jungle. The trees are spruce and nes of various varieties. Some of them are as big a nd as a flour barrel and as tall as a four-story hous As we ascend they grow smaller and smaller and s ter and shorter, until at last they range in height om ll the way up the mountains you can se the remains of the trail which the gd hunters climbed before the iron tr k was constructed. They made th way through the ice and snow, ar many died before they reached the to of the pass. One part of the trail is nown as the Dead Horse Canyon. It as so named for the dead horses that ga up their equine ghosts at that pc t. They started out loaded, but we unable to bear the toil of the jo ney. The year before the road was bt t more than 5,000 dead horses were co ted on the trail. Some had lost th footing and been dashed to death or he rocks below. Others had sunk u er their burdens in utter exhaustion a had to be thrown over the rocks, w e still others lost heart and actu- al committed suicide by throwing th nselves over the cliffs. One miner dr ing a mule team got the animals at la to the top, when the leader jumped ov the precipice, dragging the other a nals with him. All were killed as th fell on the rocks in the valley below. T leader had been twice over the trail.

A rotary plow that can cut through drifts twelve feet deep th of one's waist to his shoulder. H ier still they become mere shrubs th crawl on the ground. And still th are perfect trees, although they ha been flattened by the snow that lie on them during the greater part of ie winter. At a little distance they lo like a carpet of green on the sides of he hills. Close to the track they m e you think of the dwarfed pines of Ja n, which may be centuries old, al ough less than two feet in height.

uring the winter of 1897 thirty-three th sand men and women came up the m ntains over the trails on their way to D son. Most of them carried packs on th r backs, some making numerous tr s, during which they took from fifty to ne hundred pounds at a time. Some ha sleds, which they pulled up the m ntains, a single sled carrying per- h s two hundred pounds. The aver- ag outfit of the Klondiker was about o ton, or two thousand pounds, and th cost of getting this over the trail w enormous. Mules and horses were u d, Indians were hired to aid in pack- in the outfits, and the charge by them w 7 cents and upward per pound. On th Dyea trail the Indians got 10 or 15 ce s a pound for taking an outfit fifty m s. The Indians went in families. A an would pack from one hundred to o hundred and forty pounds, a squaw fr eighty to one hundred pounds and gi and boys from twenty-five to fifty p nds apiece. Some of the white men w t into packing and teaming as a b iness. One man is said to have made $ 0,000 by transporting the baggage a supplies of the goldseekers. Another th w a log across a stream and charged 5 cents toll for the use of his bridge.

DURING my trip over the White Pass road I had as a seatmate E er J. White, who was long our Amer- ic consul at White Horse, and who has b n in this country since the gold ru. His stories of the queer sights on th trail are interesting. Said he:

The men carried goods of every de- sc ption. I remember one prospector w packed a grindstone up the hills o his back. Every one wondered what he was going to do with it. He brought it to White Horse and finally to Dawson. There he had a carpenter make him a frame for the stone. When this was completed he let the miners sharpen their axes and picks at 25 cents apiece. They did the work while he sat back and took in a dollar or more an hour for the rent of the grindstone.

"Another man was loaded with window panes. He had sheets of glass seven by nine inches in size. When he got to Dawson he sold them for $2 a pane. Glass was so scarce at that time that beer bottles brought a price as window lights for log cabins. They were piled up lengthwise or set endwise into the windows, being chinked round with mud."

Some of Mr. White's stories related to the towns along the line. There were settlements of log huts and cities of tents. The town of White Pass contained thousands of tents, occupied by men and women waiting for rafts and boats to be completed to carry them down through the lakes and by way of the river to Dawson. In the spring of 1898 there were 20,000 persons camped at the head of Lake Bennett at the time of the breaking of the ice, and on the shores of the lake you can still see the remains of Mike King's sawmill, which cut lumber at the rate of $80 per thousand and upward for the making of boats to go over the lake.

As the crow flies the distance from Skagway to the summit of the White Pass is only fourteen miles, but the railroad track is six miles longer in order to get grades by which the cars could be dragged up the mountains. Our train stopped on the crest of the pass, where the waters flowing into the two oceans divide, and where side by side float the flags of America and Canada. Here, within a few feet of each other, are two streams. One flows toward the west, through United States territory, and after a course of twenty odd miles is lost in the Pacific at Skagway. The other winds its way on down into the Yukon, and it has over 2,000 miles of travel before it reaches Bering Sea. I threw a couple of chips into the streams. One has long since been lost in the Pacific Ocean, and I am in hopes that the other will in time reach the same body of water not far from the Arctic.

Our international boundary is along the crest of the mountains. We have a strip of country in southeastern Alaska which comprises the Alexander archipelago and all of the mainland thirty miles back from the seacoast or to the crest of the range which borders it. This coastal strip extends from the White Pass to the Portland Canal at the south and along the range at the north as far as Mount St. Elias, from where there is a straight line between the two countries northward to the Arctic Ocean.

The Yukon, which has its headwaters in the lakes back of Skagway, flows through Canadian territory for a winding distance almost as great as from Chicago to New Orleans before it crosses the international boundary near the village of Eagle. About twenty miles of the White Pass Railway is in United States territory, and in the neighborhood of ninety miles is in the Dominion of Canada.

The Mother's Prayer

By
MARIETTA HOLLEY

THE foe is great, the foe is strong,
Our empty hands are weak;
We, who have toiled and suffered long—
Our fears we cannot speak.
Our faithful labors night and day,
This foe, Strong Drink, destroys;
We kneel amid the gloom and pray
Oh! who will save our boys?

So great, so cunning is this foe,
Linked sins in ambush way—
Temptation's rosy mist they throw
And lure young souls away;
The mighty power of banded wrong
Satan's own art employs;
The enemy is great and strong,
Oh! who will save our boys?

Those who should help us turn and flock
To help the foe instead.
Their hearts seem like the untouched rock
On which vain tears are shed.
The powers of good seem lost and riven,
And o'er life's din and noise,
This anguished cry ascends to heaven:
"Oh! who will save our boys?"

Led by the cold still hand-maid, Pain,
In depths with God alone,
We wrestled for this prescious gain;
We earned them for our own.
How can we see them ruined, sink
From us and heaven away;
We reach our weak arms o'er the brink,
"God, save our boys today!"

He who of old gave weakness power
A giant strong to slay,
Oh! will he hear our prayers this hour—
Deliver us this day?
We know His heart enfolds the earth,
Touched by its woe, its joy;
Oh God, in far-off Nazareth
Your Son was once a boy.

A LIGHT dawns in the eastern skies
The prophets saw afar;
It led of old the Magi wise,
Who earnest sought the Star.
We kneel and hail its dawning ray,
The Light takes shape and voice.
"Toil on and trust that Star today,
Our God can save the boys."

Girls Who Make Good

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

II The Girl Who Dreamed

MARY ELLEN had very few friends in school. I remember her, a chubby wistful little figure standing on the edge of the playground watching the other girls indulge in the fascinating game of hop-scotch. She was seldom invited to join the game, was Mary Ellen, for she was a bashful child, conscious of every look or word, painfully aware of her chubbiness.

"Don't let's ask Mary Ellen to play with us," the children were wont to say, "Mary Ellen never talks. When she hops, Mary Ellen always trips and rubs out the lines." Children are very cruel, sometimes, in a matter-of-fact sort of way that is hard to bear.

Mary Ellen and I had gone to school two years before I ever noticed her particularly—before I ever thought of her as anything but a wistfully chubby child standing on the outskirts of a merry crowd. I noticed her first when our teacher read the best of the week's compositions. Mary Ellen's compsotion was the finest one read.

"The mountain," said Mary Ellen's composition, "looked down on the meadow as a kind grandfather looks down on a little child."

I glanced at Mary Ellen's wistful but chubbily uninteresting little face, and wondered how that had ever occurred to her. On the way home from school I lagged behind the others, for I wanted to talk to Mary Ellen, and Mary Ellen could always be found lagging behind. Her little face flushed in a rather embarrassed way as she saw that I was waiting for her.

"Mary Ellen," I asked as we fell into step, "Mary Ellen, how did you happen to think that the mountain in your composition was like a grandfather? And the meadow like a little child?"

MARY ELLEN'S eyes looked at me, and—had I been older, I would have noticed the deep dream that lay hidden in the soul behind them.

"Oh," she murmured shyly, "the mountain looked so—so old and—stately." (It was a big word for a little girl.) "And the meadow," she continued, "looked so young and—and happy. That's why!"

I was frankly interested and she noticed it. Children can always detect interest—real interest. After a moment Mary Ellen spoke again.

"I always imagine things like that," she said, "when I'm alone. I can't help wondering what the trees are thinking about, and what the flowers say when we're in bed at night. I often wish I was on a cloud up in the sky and could look down on you people walking on the ground. I often guess how it would feel to be a bird, and fly. Don't you?"

It was a long speech—for Mary Ellen. She stopped rather abruptly and her small face flushed rosy-red.

"I often think when I'm alone," she said half ashamedly, "about things like that."

THE next morning I met our teacher on the way to school. When one was early one often met one's teacher. My teacher was pretty and—I was often early.

"I walked home with Mary Ellen, last night," I told my teacher a bit self-consciously. "Mary Ellen thinks very queer things. Mary Ellen says that she always thinks queer things when she's alone!"

The teacher's hand rested lightly, for a moment, on my hair. "Mary Ellen is alone too much," said the teacher. "I wish you children would try to realize what a remarkable little girl she is. Her compositions are such odd, fanciful things. Some day—" and the teacher smiled.

IT was perhaps due to that little talk that Mary Ellen and I became such firm friends. On our frequent walks home from school I discovered that the small chubby girl lived in a world of dreams, peopled by dream-folk. I found that her vague wonderings showed the depths of a very clever brain that ell behind the roundness of her eyes. nd as I came to know the fancies hat sprang up in her brain, I began t ike Mary Ellen.

Commonplace people usually ock with commonplace people. That p ved to be so in the case of Mary Ell for most of the children in school cont ued to leave her out of their hop-s tch games and parties. But I knew hat Mary Ellen, standing on the out rts of the laughing crowd, was wand ing far afield in a fairy world.

CHILD friendships are strang affairs. Some of them are cr ed very easily, and some of them e ure forever. When Mary Ellen n ed away from town she was still a ch by wistful-eyed little girl, strangely a ne, but her image will always be wit ne. I remember how she kissed me go by shyly. How she began to cry w n I asked her if she would write to me

"I'll try to," she choked, "I it hardly seems as if I could bear to ow. But I'll never forget you, never! S m as if I'm going to the land behin the moon. . . . Cold, and awful far aw !"

I cried, too, but even as I was c ing my mind dwelt rather happily o her little farewell speech. The on country—the name charmed me. old my teacher about it next day.

"I'll miss Mary Ellen," I con led to her.

"So will I," answered my tea er, "she was such an old-fashioned tle thing."

MARY ELLEN did not writ nd neither did I—after a brief tal or two. And yet our friendship wa ne of the enduring-forever kind. E ry flower, every tree, every rainbow, ery shy star—almost—brought Mary len before me in a vivid way. It w n't her chubby form that I remem ed or her wistful face. It was the uff of her dreams that caught and eld my imagination. I went on pla ng hop-scotch with the other children ut they were even more commonplace ter the companionship of Mary Ellen nd the thought of her stayed with me

Years pass very swiftly indeed. ly school days were over before I kn it, and I was occupying a desk in an ce, and learning something about the eat world of American business. My air was tucked up and my skirts were g, and my hop-scotch days were a ng in the far distance. And then one n ning on my letter-cluttered de I found a marked copy of a magazin I turned the leaves until I came to a em with a familiar name signed at th nd of it. It was a remarkable little p m, and the name signed was Mary El 's.

I saw many of Mary Ellen's v ses after that. I looked for them. At rst they blossomed out, shyly, in the ch per papers, but later certain standard gazines featured her work. "A co ng young poetess," they called her. nd I smiled to myself as I thought o he chubby child with the wistful e, and the tear-wet eyes, who had k ed me good-by.

People of the literary world were eginning to talk of the new genius ho was writing such wonderful verse. " nd selling it—" added the more comme ial ones. "Anybody can write verse, ut only a genius can sell it."

ONE day I was sitting idly at y desk when Mary Ellen ne breezily in at the door. I didn't ow her, at first, for she was tall and sle er and she wore her clothes with a na al charm, very unlike the way my le friend had worn her gingham fr s. But when she took my hands a I looked deep into her eyes, I saw he same soul, laden with dream-fan s, smiling out at me.

"Oh, Mary Ellen," I exclai d; "I'm glad—glad to see you!"

"And I'm glad to see you," she ld me. "I remember how kind you re to a shy little girl that the others r- got about. I'll always remembe I think." And she kissed me.

MARY ELLEN is rather famous now, but I know her very well in- dd, and as I lunch with her, as I take t in her studio, I know that she is the sae girl who was chubby and wistful; t same girl who watched from the o skirts of the crowd. I know that the sae dreams have their home in her bin, that the same visions dwell in h inmost heart of hearts. Then, when s stood by silently, the children t ught that she was stupid. Now c dren, grown up, know that she is c ating great poems, that some mar- vons idea is ever forming in her mind, a when she is silent they look at her wh a vast respect.

Mary Ellen gave a reading of her vses the other day. A great crowd t onged the hall to hear and see her, f Mary Ellen—aside from being a genius—is very easy to look at. When she had finished I began worming my way toward her through the crowd. I paused behind a knot of women who were talking rather loudly, and with a start I recognized one of them as an erstwhile classmate of mine—a girl who had gone up from kindergarten to the end of my school days with me. I was a bit surprised to see her there, for she had been one of the children who used to say, "Don't let's ask Mary Ellen to play with us."

As I paused at her elbow, the whole picture came back to me—the dusty playground, the laughing crowd, the wistful child that was always looking on. And, then I laughed softly.

"Oh, yes, I know Mary Ellen very well indeed," she was saying. "Why, we went to school together."

he Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.D.

HAVE lately had a conversation with a Persian, a Mohammedan, about this war a Christianity. I told him that Christ taght "Blessed are the poor," while the men w caused the war were anxious to get rich, i erms of power if not of wealth. Is it litera to be accepted that it is better to be poor th rich? If so, in terms of what? If it was an apted dogma, would not there be an e aordinary readjustment of many habits of tlight which at the present are, or seem to be, v real obstacles in the way of realizing the ptical side of the truth. "Ye are members o of another?"—C. R. L. K.

THE primary essential is a true understanding of our Lord's doctrine of poverty and wealth; and t lack of this has occasioned two ntually antagonistic and equally erronus attitudes. (1) It has been supposed t t he unconditionally condemned wlth, and taught that poverty is the oy pathway to heaven. This was the Eonite doctrine practiced by the Jish sect of the Essenes in his day; al it is the principle of monasticism in a its phases. There are indeed sayings o our Lord which seem to countenance ts attitude. Thus, Evagrius, the cbrated hermit of the Nitrian desert i the fourth century, tells of a brother vose sole possession was a Gospel, and l sold this to provide food for the hgry. "I have sold," he said, "the vrd itself, which says: 'Sell that thou lst, and give to the poor'" (Matt. 1:21). And it was hearing the priest i the chapel of the Portiuncula in 1209 r d the Lord's charge to his apostles t go forth unprovided (Matt. 10:7-10) tt moved Francis of Assisi to embrace perty as his bride. (2) This interptation of our Lord's teaching is pctically possible only for enthusiasts v h a sublime contempt of actualities, a l those sayings have been otherwise hdled. A favorite device is to interpret tm spiritually. Thus in Matthew's port (ver. 3) "the poor" is homileticav amplified into "the poor in spirit." is is indeed true, but it was of literal perty that our Lord spoke (Luke 20, 21, 24, 25).

On the other hand, the critics of last neration accepted the sayings literally, d either, like Renan, saw in them the practical enthusiasm of the young ealist of Galilee or stigmatized them Ebionite interpolations. The explanan lies, to my mind, in a just appreciatn of our Lord's attitude toward verty and wealth; and the fact is not it he regarded the latter as an evil, d inculcated the necessity of poverty order to win heaven, but that he ssociated blessedness entirely from ternal circumstances. The world's a is that happiness lies in prosperity d is impossible in adversity, and the rd shows that it has a deeper source, d is within the reach of all. Of this was himself the supreme evidence. lived a life of continual privation d distress, yet the fulness of peace d joy was his, insomuch that he queathed his peace to his disciples as eir most precious heritage (John 14:), and he could desire nothing better them than that they should have his fulfilled in them (17:13). Hence pears the meaning of his benediction the poor.

And what of his seeming condemnation riches? It is never absolute. Somenes it was his test of aspirants to disleship. The Messiah was pictured in those days as a victorious king, who should restore the ancient throne of David; and many who witnessed his miracles would have followed him in the hope of sharing his royal glory. Such he always warned by showing them the stern reality—participation in his homeless lot (Matt. 8:19, 20; Luke 14:26, 33). Sometimes, again, the demand to renounce their possessions was addressed to those who, like the young ruler, were prizing these too much (Matt. 19:22-24). The truth is that neither is poverty good in itself, nor wealth evil. They are God's appointments, and they are good or evil according to the use we make of them.

The Uplift of the Negro

ONE of the rising institutions of the South is the Slater Industrial and State Normal School for colored people. It is located at Winston-Salem, N. C., where it is doing a very remarkable work in educating and Christianizing the American negro. Mr. W. A. Blair, a leading banker and business man of Winston-Salem, speaking of this institution, says: "The line on which it is conducted offers the only solution of the race problem. Its influence has been very good; we have no race friction here now, the Slater School is no longer an experiment but a splendid reality, being as important as any in the entire South for the colored race, outside of Hampton and Tuskegee." Its land, buildings, equipment, etc., cost $50,000. The graduate students and friends have done much of the manual labor in erecting the buildings. The State officials, appreciating the character and extent of the work, offered the school $12,000 additional upon a similar amount being raised by the trustees, in order that a new building—which is very greatly needed—might be erected to be used as a hospital and training-school for colored nurses. All the construction will be contributed free by the colored people themselves, enabling the trustees to put up a very commodious and serviceable building, if the money can be raised now. A great effort has been made by friends of the institution and the Christian Herald has been requested to lay the matter before its readers, some of whom have helped the Slater School in the past, and who are therefore interested in its welfare. Contributions for this deserving cause may be sent to the care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, N. Y., which will remit the same to the treasurer.

MR. J. CRAWFORD JOLLY of Warren, Ark., has attended Sunday school every Sunday for more than eighteen years, and his friends believe he is the champion Sunday school attendant of the world. The nearest he ever came to missing was when he was confined in a hospital. He had orders not to leave his bed, but when his nurse was absent he donned his clothing and made his way to another part of the building, where he sat through the Sunday school session. Mr. Jolly is not only an attendant, but takes an active interest in Sunday school work. He is editor of the Bradley County Eagle.

A Bate-Built Car

Which Marks the Pinnacle In Efficiency Engineering

John W. Bate, the efficiency engineer, says that his work seems done.

He says that this factory, which he designed and equipped, represents the last word in efficiency.

He says that this Mid-Year Mitchell — his 17th model — embodies every improvement he knows.

So you see here his finished effort.

Over 700 Improvements

Efficiency means two things in motor car building. First, it means factory economy. Mr. Bate has reduced our factory costs 50 per cent. In this model plant, covering 45 acres, this Mitchell car is built for far less than anyone else could build it.

But efficiency also means a perfect car. Mr. Bate has made, in the Mitchell car, over 700 improvements.

You see here utter simplicity. You see lightness combined with big margins of safety. You see the easiest-driving car ever built. You see an almost trouble-proof car.

You see a car with few castings. There are 440 parts which are either drop forged or stamped from toughened steel.

You see a marvel of endurance—practically a life time car. One Mitchell—still running—has covered 218,732 miles. Six Mitchells have averaged 164,372 miles each — over 30 years of ordinary service.

You see the car which great engineers select for their personal use. Your Mitchell dealer has a list of them—experts of nation-wide fame. They have found it mechanically perfect.

73 New Ideas—26 Extras

This Mid-Year Mitchell, in design and equipment, brings out 73 new ideas. It embodies all the best new touches found in this year's models. Before its completion our experts examined 257 new models at the January Shows. And all the ideas that people liked best are found in this single car.

In addition, it has 26 extras. These are costly features which in other cars cost an extra price. In the Mid-Year Mitchell they are paid for out of factory savings.

They include a power tire pump, a new-type control, ball-bearing steering gear, an extra-cost carburetor, reversible headlights, Bate cantilever springs.

There's a light in the tonneau, a locked compartment for valuables, an engine primer at the driver's hand.

Let your Mitchell dealer show you all these extras. You will see here the most complete car that's built. You will see the handsomest car on exhibit. You will see the greatest value ever offered in a high-grade car.

is the most satisfactory substitute for the mother's breast. The nipple is correctly shaped; broad, soft and yielding. The Patented Valve (see above) regulates the flow of food, assuring a natural-like, satisfying supply; and, with the Reenforcing Ribs, prevents collapsing. The nipple fits the bottle tightly. Never Leaks; is easily put on, and the baby cannot pull it off.

This nipple is the finest "live" rubber, very different from inferior, black compounded nipples. It is clean and sanitary, can be sterilized repeatedly and lasts for months. The FAULTLESS "Natural Nurser" is the most economical of all nursers.

Another Pentecostal Drama

By Arthur H. Howland

THE eight chapters studied this quarter contain so many acts and scenes that it would be impossible to stage the events for action at a single performance unless the whole day could be given to it as is done for the Passion Play at Oberammergau. But to reduce these chapters to the form of a drama as was done with the first eight chapters at the first quarterly review will probably be the best way to impress the events and their significance upon the minds of the students.

The Dramatis Personæ of the six acts covering the eight chapters from Acts 9 to 16 are as follows: Paul; Peter; Cornelius; Herod; Barnabas; Silas; Luke (not mentioned, but whose presence is implied in the "we passages" beginning chap. 16:10); John Mark; Timothy; Ananias; Sergius Paulus; Elymas; Æneas; the priest of Jupiter at Lystra; the Cripple at Lystra; Philippian Jailer; Mary (John Mark's mother); Rhoda; Dorcas; Eunice, Timothy's mother, and Lois, his grandmother (II Tim. 1:5); Lydia, the slave-girl at Philippi; stoners of Paul at Lystra; masters of the slave-girl at Philippi; magistrates; soldiers; prison attendants; worshipers at the synagogues; Jewish trouble-makers; members of Council at Jerusalem; crowds and mobs in various cities.

The six acts are as follows: Act I. Saul's Conversion. Scene 1: The blinding light on the Damascus Road. Scene 2: Saul receiving the Holy Spirit's blessing in the house of Judas on Straight Street as Ananias prays. Scene 3: Saul's escape from Damascus by being let down the outer wall of the city in a basket. Scene 4: Paul introduced by Barnabas to the Christian leaders at Jerusalem.

Act II. Conversion of Cornelius. Scene 1: Peter heals Æneas at Lydda. Scene 2: Dorcas revived by Peter at Joppa. Scene 3: Peter's dream, the sheet full of unclean animals lowered from the upper air as he is sleeping on a house top at the home of Simon the Tanner. Scene 4: The Holy Spirit falling upon the household of Cornelius and his friends as Peter preaches to them in the home of the centurion at Cæsarea. Scene 5: Christian leaders at Jerusalem sanction Peter's act of preaching to the Gentiles.

Act III. Peter's Escape from Prison. Scene 1: James beheaded. Scene 2: Peter is imprisoned and escapes. Scene 3: The interrupted prayer meeting at the house of John Mark's mother, Peter returning from prison while they are praying for his release. Scene 4: The death of the persecutor Herod as he sits upon his throne allowing the people to declare he is a god.

Act IV. The First Missionary Journey. Scene 1: Paul and Barnabas, having returned from their relief trip to Jerusalem (Acts 11:29-30), are set apart for missionary work as the Christians of Antioch meet to pray. Scene 2: Sergius Paulus, the Roman deputy of Cyprus, hears the Gospel; Elymas, the sorcerer, disputes with Paul and becomes blind. Scene 3: Paul and Barnabas turn to the Gentiles at Pisidian Antioch after the Jews there refuse to accept their message. Scene 4: After the persecution at Iconium and the escape from that city to Lystra, Paul heals the lame man. The people led by the priest of Jupiter wish to worship the disciples; then when Jews from Antioch come to Iconium to bring an evil report, they stone Paul and drag him out of the city, thinking him dead. He rises and walks back to the city. Scene 5: Paul and Barnabas return to Antioch.

Act V. The Council at Jerusalem decides to free the Gentile Christians from the restrictions of the Mosaic law. Scene 1: Trouble-making Jewish Christians come to Antioch and insist that the Gentile converts must keep the law of Moses. Scene 2: The Council at Jerusalem decides that they need not do so. Scene 3: Paul and Barnabas, with Judas and Silas, tell the good news to the Christians at Antioch.

Act VI. The Gospel Brought to Europe (first stages of the Second Missionary Journey). Scene 1: Paul and Barnabas disagree about taking John Mark with them, and Paul chooses Silas to go with him. Scene 2: Paul finds Timothy, a young, efficient Christian worker, at Lystra (or Derbe). Scene 3: The call to Macedonia, while Paul is at Troy. Scene 4: The fortune-telling slave-girl at Philippi is converted, her masters have Paul and Silas arrested, and they are put in prison. Scene 5: An earthquake shakes the prison, loosens the staples and rings to which the prisoners' chains are fastened, the jailer rushes in, and as he listens to the words of Paul, he is converted.

Again we find two currents of action, one toward good, the other obstructing and hindering the forward movement. We found, distinctly marked in the first eight chapters, the movement toward God and toward Fraternity. In the next eight chapters are found the further movements toward Liberty, toward Expansion, toward Organization. It happens that the one act in the present drama which has the least dramatic interest is as a matter of fact the most important in considering the progress of the Christian movement, that is Act V, the Council at Jerusalem, described in the fifteenth chapter of Acts. It was here that the leaders of the church decided that Christianity must be allowed to break through the narrow limits of Judaism and flow out with its healing, strengthening energies toward all the world.

Some of the adult classes would do well to study in connection with this lesson of liberty some of Paul's great writings on the subject, particularly the third, fourth and fifth chapters of Galatians, in which he scolds the members of the Galatian Church for desiring, after they had been made free from the yoke of the ceremonial law by the power of the Gospel, to submit themselves to its bondage again. He sums up the whole situation in Galatians 5:6: "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love." Read also Paul's wonderful summary of Christian obligation in Romans 13:8-10, culminating with the words: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the Law."

The Christian religion is a matter of life, of freedom, of enthusiasm, of love, of opportunity, of joy; not a thing of formalism and cold obedience, of the dreary bearing of burdens and the painful doing of difficult duties. The church at Antioch received with gladness and gratitude the message of freedom and joy which came from the Council at Jerusalem, and that heritage of liberty and joy is ours today. Again and again throughout the centuries certain groups of Christians have tried to bind the hearts of believers with burdens heavy to be borne, burdens of belief in non-essential dogma, burdens of obedience to unauthorized authorities and uninspired restrictions and laws, burdens of cold formalism and heavy ritualism. All such things are really hindrances to the great forward sweep of Christianity toward the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

Nothing seems easier to forget than that God desires us to be sons rather than slaves, friends rather than servants. We remember many of the sayings of Jesus but forget that he said: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends." (John 15:15.)

In the study of the drama portrayed in these chapters of the Acts we find again the hinderers, hinderers who were trying to defeat the forward movement, trying to turn the drama into a tragedy. Most of the main actors are helping forward the right movement, helping by hard work, by earnest testimony, by [illegible], faithful, happy living. And here are the hinderers: Herod, beheading James, and imprisoning Peter; Elymas, moved by jealousy to dispute Paul's preaching before the deputy; some Jews who tried to kill Paul in Damascus; the Jews who drove Paul and Barnabas out of Pisidian Antioch; the leaders of the hostile mob at Iconium; certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium who came to Lystra and persuaded the people to turn against Paul and finally to stone him; those who threw the stones upon the apostle, nearly killing him; the trouble-making Jewish Christians who doubtless thought they were doing right, but who were really working at cross purposes with God, insisting that the Gentile Christians should become circumcised; the masters of the slave-girl at Philippi, and the magistrates who committed Paul and Silas to jail.

Again the question, Which side are we on in the present-day acts of this age-long drama of the Gospel? Notice particularly that we may be hindering without realizing it, just as Saul first hindered, thinking that he was doing God's service in persecuting the early Church; just as doubtless some of the Jews in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch and other places thought they were pleasing God by being faithful to the old doctrines and forms and rejecting the teachings of the disciples; just as the Jewish Christians from Jerusalem thought they were doing right in insisting that the new Gentile Christians must observe the old Mosaic law; just as even the magistrates at Philippi probably thought they were doing right in committing these trouble-making street preachers to jail. There is only one way to make sure that we are helping all the time and not hindering—that is by asking every day the question Saul of Tarsus asked from the dust of the Damascus road: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

Notice the passages that show the movement toward brotherhood—Acts 9:27-28, showing how the Christians at Jerusalem received their new brother, Saul; Acts 10:39, describing the charitable works of Dorcas; 10:4, 31, praising the benevolence of Cornelius; the whole of the tenth chapter and the first eighteen verses of the eleventh, showing how the Gentiles were included in the offers of the Gospel; 11:28-30, describing the relief sent from the Antioch Church to the needy Christians at Jerusalem; chapter 15, the removal of the burdens of the ceremonial law from the Gentile converts; all the acts of mercy and words of comfort performed and spoken by Christian leaders.

Modern scholars are inclined to read in the records of the Acts and the Epistles signs of a sharp and perhaps bitter controversy between Peter and Paul. There is undoubtedly some unwritten history here which would be most intensely interesting if it could be gotten at. It is certainly strange that after the twelfth chapter of the Acts, Peter passes so completely out of Luke's narrative. It cannot be that he was executed at about this time because Paul refers in Galatians 2:11-14 to a visit of Peter in Antioch which evidently took place some time later and was the occasion of one episode in the contention between the two apostles; and Peter in his second epistle refers graciously and lovingly to the letters of Paul to the churches. It may be that the separation of Paul and John Mark had something to do with this estrangement, because we know that Mark became the close associate of Peter, and doubtless wrote his Gospel under Peter's direction. On the other hand, we know that Mark came again to be a close and comforting companion to Paul. The chief point that the scholars make is that there are clear signs of two distinct, and to some extent, conflicting, wings in the early Christian church, one emphasizing Christian deeds, the other emphasizing Christian faith. The Epistle of James is supposed to represent the former wing, of which Peter is believed to have been the leader. Paul's preaching and writing were the inspiration and instruction of the other wing, of which he was the leader, emphasizing dogma at the expense, so some scholars contend, of service. But the conclusive answer to all these objectors to the leadership and teaching of Paul is the 13th chapter of I Corinthians. A man who could write that chapter should never be accused of standing in the way of Christian love and service. Indeed, his epistles are full of love, and contain many exhortations to generosity, self-sacrifice and service. The theory of atonement which he developed and taught was to him only a guide, by which sinful, selfish men, getting rid of the anxiety over past sins and the curse of present sins, could find their way into a life of love, lived under the smile of God and for the sake of their fellow men. Peter's epistles present, as a matter of fact, the same theory of the atonement as Paul's. The four great epistle writers of the New Testament, Paul, James, Peter and John, present after all a marked unity, calling all men into intimate fellowship with God and to affectionate, helpful comradeship with their neighbors.

Notice finally three ideas of God in these eight chapters. When Herod was making his great speech the people cried out: "It is the voice of a god and not of a man." (Acts 12:21-22.) Again at Lystra the people were so amazed at the spiritual power of Paul and Barnabas, they cried out: "God has come down to us in the likeness of men," and wished to worship them and offered sacrifices. These incidents reveal the real thirst for God that is in the souls of people everywhere. They are eager to find Him, searching for Him in every event and every place. The psalmist has given a vivid picture of that quenchless thirst of the soul after God in the palpitant words: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." (Psalm 42:1-2.) Now God had indeed come down to these people of western Asia long ago, but not in the way they thought. Not in the eloquent words of a brilliant king, not in visible form in the persons of wandering miracle-workers, but in the souls of these humble preachers of the word and the souls of their comrades in the faith. God had come down to them in the presence of the Holy Spirit. It is He, the Holy Spirit, who is the great, dominant, efficient, triumphant personality in all these chapters of the Acts of the Apostles. He was in the souls of these believers in Jesus, and their work was to persuade others to receive him too. He is in the world today. God has thus come down to men. And your life and mine may be the channels through which this ever-living God may enter the souls of needy people who crowd about us in these busy days, thirsting for Him.

UNDER the personal leadership of Rev. A. C. Dixon, who has just terminated his year of office as President of the London Baptist Association, a six months' Evangelistic Campaign, in which practically the whole of the London area churches of his denomination, numbering some 230, took part, has recently been conducted with fruitful results. Dr. Dixon, in addition to conducting numerous evangelistic meetings, held conferences with groups of ministers, which were responsible for much of the success of the movement. In addition to his other work, Dr. Dixon is President of the London Christian Endeavor Federation, and lately carried through a Baptist and Endeavor Campaign simultaneously, the two movements achieving fine results. The Endeavor Federation has 20,000 members and between 500 and 600 Societies.

FLOYD JOHN EVANS, Union evangelist, of Topeka, Kans., who recently held a series of successful meetings in Michigan, is now engaged in a tabernacle campaign at White Cloud, Kans.

The FRANKLIN CAR

THERE is a special appeal in the Franklin car to substantial, well-to-do folks who consider the comfort of the entire family.

Its list of owners will prove above all that the Franklin is not the car of a cheap or a showy class of people—but of people who are sure enough of themselves and their position to seek their luxury in service as well as in appearance.

For the fullest service, the ideal family car is one that a woman can drive as easily as a man, without tiring.

It must be a light-weight car.

It must be smooth-riding—save the rider from road shock, as well as in back country roads as on the city streets.

It must be easy to steer and control—demand no muscular exertion of the driver, and be safe.

It must be a smart-looking car—appropriate for the morning's shopping, for afternoon or evening use; and commodious for the week-end tour.

To anyone who knows the automobile situation it is most significant that the Franklin has been adopted by so many prominent families who might easily afford any price car.

Every practical-minded motorist should read the new book, "Why the Average Motorist's Dollar is Shrinking." Send your name on a postcard for a copy.

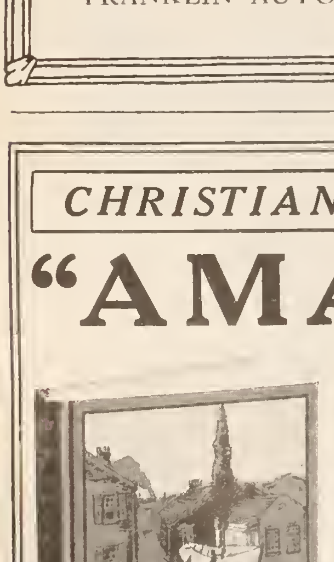
"AMARILLY"

In Book Form



We have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the Boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story. In the human appeal, sweet humor, and genuine cheeriness between its covers, there will await you many laughs; and a tear or two as well.

We will send "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," attractively bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $2.00.
Or, we will send "Amarilly" to old subscribers as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.00.

The President on Peace

quarter of the globe, has of necessity engulfed many a fair province of right that lies very near to us. Our own rights as a nation, the liberties, the privileges, and the property of our people have been profoundly affected.

We are not mere disconnected lookers-on. The longer the war lasts the more deeply do we become concerned that it should be brought to an end and the world be permitted to resume its normal life and course again. And when it does come to an end, we shall be as much concerned as the nations at war to see peace assume an aspect of permanence, give promise of days from which the anxiety of uncertainty shall be lifted, bring some assurance that peace and war shall always hereafter be reckoned part of the common interest of mankind.

We are participants, whether we would or not, in the life of the world. The interests of all nations are our own also. We are partners with the rest. What effects mankind is inevitably our affair as well as the affair of the nations of Europe and of Asia.

One observation on the causes of the present war we are at liberty to make, and to make it may throw some light forward upon the future, as well as backward upon the past. It is plain that this war could have come only as it did, suddenly and out of secret counsels, without warning to the world, without discussion, without any of the deliberate movements of counsel with which it would seem natural to approach so stupendous a contest. It is probable that if it had been foreseen just what would happen, just what alliances would be formed, just what forces arrayed against one another, those who brought the great contest on would have been glad to substitute conference for force.

If we ourselves had been afforded some opportunity to apprise the belligerents of the attitude which it would be our duty to take, of the policies and practices against which we would feel bound to use all our moral and economic strength, and in certain circumstances even our physical strength also, our own contribution to the counsel, which might have averted the struggle, would have been considered worth weighing and regarding.

And the lesson, which the shock of being taken by suprise in a matter so deeply vital to all the nations of the world has made poignantly clear, is that the peace of the world must henceforth depend upon a new and more wholesome diplomacy. Only when the great nations of the world have reached some sort of agreement as to what they hold to be fundamental to their common interest, and as to some feasible method of acting in concert when any nation or group of nations seeks to disturb those fundamental things, can we feel that civilization is at last in a way of justifying its existence and claiming to be finally established. It is clear that nations must in the future be governed by the same high code of honor that we demand of individuals.

We must, indeed, in the very same breath with which we avow this conviction, admit that we have ourselves upon occasion in the past been offenders against the law of diplomacy, which we thus forecast; but our conviction is not the less clear, but rather the more clear, on that account.

If this war has accomplished nothing else for the benefit of the world, it has at least disclosed a great moral necessity and set forward the thinking of the statesmen of the world by a whole age. Repeated utterances of the leading statesmen of most of the great nations now engaged in war have made it plain that their thought has come to this: That the principle of public right must henceforth take precedence over the individual interests of particular nations and that the nations of the world must in some way band themselves together to see that that right prevails as against any sort of selfish aggression; that henceforth alliance must not be set up against alliance, understanding against understanding, but that there must be a common agreement for a n- mon object, and that at the hea of that common object must lie the i lo- lable rights of peoples and of mank l.

The nations of the world have be ne each other's neighbors. It is to ir interest that they should unders nd each other. In order that they ay understand each other it is imper ve that they should agree to cooperat a common cause and that they shou so act that the guiding principle of at common cause shall be even-handec nd impartial justice.

This is undoubtedly the thougl of America. This is what we ourselve ill say when there comes proper occasi to say it. In the dealings of nations th one another arbitrary force mus he rejected and we must move forwa to the thought of the modern world. he thought of which peace is the ver at- mosphere. That thought consti es a chief part of the passionate convi on of America.

We believe these fundamental th s:

First, that every people has a rig to choose the sovereignty under which ey shall live. Like other nations, we ve ourselves no doubt once and a in offended against that principle whe or a little while controlled by selfish pas n, as our franker historians have en honorable enough to admit; but it as become more and more our rule o fe and action.

Second, that the small States o he world have a right to enjoy the ne respect for their sovereignty and or their territorial integrity that at and powerful nations expect and i st upon.

And, third, that the world has a ht to be free from every disturbance ts peace that has its origin in aggre on and disregard of the rights of pe es and nations.

So sincerely do we believe in t se things that I am sure that I speak he mind and wish of the people of Am ca when I say that the United Stat is willing to become a partner in ny feasible association of nations fo ed in order to realize these objects nd make them secure against violatio

There is nothing that the U ed States wants for itself that any er nation has. We are willing, on the n- trary, to limit ourselves along with m to a prescribed course of duty an e- spect for the rights of others, which ill check any selfish passion of our ow as it will check any aggressive impul of theirs.

If it should ever be our privileg to suggest or initiate a movement or peace among the nations now at r, I am sure that the people of the U ed States would wish their Governme to move along these lines:

First—Such a settlement with re rd to their own immediate interests a e belligerents may agree upon. We e nothing material of any kind to ask or ourselves, and are quite aware tha ve are in no sense or degree parties t e present quarrel. Our interest is ly in peace and its future guarantees.

Second—A universal associatio of the nations to maintain the invi te security of the highway of the sea or the common and unhindered use o ll the nations of the world, and to e- vent any war, begun either cont y to treaty covenants or without war g, and full submission of the cause o the opinion of the world—a vi al guarantee of territorial integrity d political independence.

But I did not come here, let me re t, to discuss a program. I came onl o avow a creed and give expression to e confidence I feel that the world is n now upon the eve of a great consum a- tion, when some common force wi e brought into existence which shall a- guard right as the first and most fu - mental interest of all peoples and ll Governments, when coercion shall e summoned not to the service of poli al ambition or selfish hostility, but to e service of a common order, a com n justice, and a common peace.

God grant that the dawn of that y of frank dealing and of settled pe e, concord, and cooperation may be r at hand!

Union Church of the Canal Zone

THE Panama Canal has developed other problems than those which have centered around Culebra Cut. The tendency of the earth to slide is no greater than the tendency of savage humanity to forget old landmarks and to slip into careless ways and unworthy living when home is a long way off. The religious necessities of the canal workers were recognized from the beginning of the American work on the canal, and eight chaplains, six Protestants and two Catholics, were placed on the pay rolls of the canal at small salaries. The Canal Commission built in Cristobal, Gatun, Gorgona, Las Cascadas, Empire, Culebra, Paraiso, Corozal, Ancon and Balboa combined chapels and lodge halls, furnished them and offered them for use free for social activities and for religious work, the lower floor of the buildings being made available for church services. In these chapels some good work was done by the chaplains and by volunteer workers.

Type of chapel and lodge hall built by the government

In the fall of 19[illegible] the services of six of the chaplains were discontinued. Of the two remaining chaplains, who were attached to the Ancon hospital, one was Catholic and the other a Protestant Episcopal. Early in 1914 representatives of the different congregations of the Canal Zone organized the Union Church of the Canal Zone, and union organizations existing at several points were merged into this church. Some of these had been called Christian Leagues, some Union Churches, but they had pointed the way to the solution of the problem of efficient Christian work on the Isthmus.

At the present time there are only about 4,000 whites in the Canal Zone, and it is not likely that this number will soon exceed 6,000. If this population were centered in one place, denominational work might be possible. But spread out as it is, throughout the Zone, the union of all denominations into one organization seems desirable if the work is to be self-supporting or to minister measurably to the needs which must be met. The constitution of the Union Church provides that its activities must be non-sectarian and its teaching evangelical. Any persons who present evidence of satisfactory church connections elsewhere or who are willing to sign the covenant of the church are admitted to membership, but they are permitted, if they desire, to retain their membership at home. All members of the Union Church are members of whichever chapel they find it most convenient to attend, the constant transferring of men from point to point making this sort of interchangeable membership necessary. The church covenant is as follows:

> Thankful for God's abundant goodness, and for his great gift of salvation through Jesus Christ our Lord, I hereby covenant to seek to know and to do his will, and to promote, as far as I can, the interest of Christ's kingdom.
> Accepting the Bible as my supreme standard of faith, and heartily believing in the province of private judgment in the interpretation of the Scriptures, I agree to recognize as Christians and worthy of my fellowship all who devoutly love the Lord Jesus Christ and accept his standard of teaching and conduct as set forth in the New Testament.
> Realizing that the success of the church depends upon the consecration of the individual membership, I covenant to attend its services, to contribute to its support, to labor to maintain its peace and harmony, and, as far as possible, in every way to promote its temporal and spiritual welfare.

IN the organization of this union movement, no effort has been made to set up a new denomination, but a definite effort has been made to present to Latin America, through the Union Church, living evidence of the essential unity of Christendom. The membership of the church at present numbers in the neighborhood of 400, and the total average attendance in the Sunday schools is in the neighborhood of 600. Chapels are maintained at Cristobal, Gatun, Paraiso and Balboa and Sunday school services are also maintained at Pedro Miguel.

The work of the church has prospered from its organization, and it now commands the services of two regular pastors and is planning to add one more. It is outgrowing its facilities at every point, and it is planned to erect permanent church buildings of concrete in Balboa and in Cristobal, the buildings to cost from $40,000 to $60,000.

The membership of the church now includes Episcopalians, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, United Brethren, Dutch Reformed, Disciples of Christ, Christians, Congregationalists and Lutherans. In addition to the work of the Union Church on the Isthmus, work is being carried on for white Americans by the Catholics, Episcopalians, Christian Scientists, and Southern Baptist churches, the latter church having begun a work at Balboa Heights, where they are erecting a church building. In that section of Panama City farthest from the Canal Zone there is a Methodist mission, in which services are held in English and Spanish, and this mission cooperates heartily with the Union Church. In Colon, Episcopalians use a church building built by the Panama Railroad Company. The Southern Baptist and the Wesleyan Methodists of England are reported as doing good work among the West Indians. The Salvation Army, the Seventh Day Adventists and the National Baptist Church, Colored, are also conducting work upon the Isthmus. In addition to these, the American Bible Society has two representatives, one at each end of the canal, and is erecting a building at Colon.

FOR nearly a year, a prayer meeting has been held every weekday morning at a private home in Santa Rosa, California. The time of meeting is unusual, viz: ten o'clock in the morning. Several ministers are in this gathering. The object of the meeting is to pray for a revival of spiritual life among the Christians of the community, and the salvation of the unsaved. At the same time, Bible readings are conducted in different homes in the city afternoons and evenings. These started with very few attendants, but interest has increased so that the seating capacity of some of the homes is taxed to the last degree.

Crooked Spines Made Straight

Use the Sheldon Method
30 Days at Our Risk

NO MATTER how serious your case, no matter what else you have tried, the Sheldon method consisting of a Scientific Appliance and a course of special exercises will help you and probably wholly overcome your affliction. We are so sure of this that we will make an appliance to suit your special condition and let you decide, after 30 days, whether you are satisfied. We make this unusual offer simply because in over 25,000 cases we have absolutely proved the wonderful benefit this Method brings to spinal sufferers, young and old, and in all kinds of cases.

There is no need to suffer longer or to bear the torture of old-fashioned plaster, leather or steel jackets. The Philo Appliance gives an even, perfect, adjustable support to the weakened or deformed spine and brings almost immediate relief even in the most serious cases. It is easy to put on or take off. Does not chafe or irritate. Is light and cool. The price is within reach of all. You owe it to yourself, or the afflicted one in your family, to find out about it. Describe your trouble fully so we can advise you intelligently.

Attracting Birds About the Home

BIRDS may be kept about us all the year with ease and certainty, merely by offering what the birds want.

You want birds about on account of their beauty and song, and because of their economic worth as insect destroyers. They can be readily attracted by furnishing safe retreats in which they can rear their young comfortably. No attraction for summer birds is more effectual than a few houses suited to their needs and habits. The house wren, the bluebird, the tree swallow and the martin are sure to be attracted if offered a suitable house to live in.

We want to help readers of the Christian Herald provide ways to attract birds about the home. We are arranging for a supply of bird houses at reasonable prices, further announcements of which will be made in future issues.

A Swinging Combination House

An attractive rustic house, to hang in a favorite tree near the home. Suitable for wren or bluebird. Exceedingly well made. Sent, postpaid, for $1.35.

"How to Build and Use Bird Houses"

This little booklet contains plain information about attracting, feeding and protecting birds, together with five full-size patterns of practical bird houses that can be readily made by anyone. There is a separate pattern (full size) of the different sections of each house. The pattern can be pasted lightly on the wood to be used for each section, then cut to the proper shape and size. The different sections will fit exactly, a few nails completing the construction. If bought ready-made, such houses would cost at least one dollar each.

SPECIAL BIRD HOUSE OFFER No. 3

We will send the Swinging House illustrated here, prepaid, a copy of "How to Build and Use Bird Houses," together with the Christian Herald for one year, all for $2.50

REAL PEOPLE AND DREAMS

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., does not make up her stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind as winter sprites trace wonderful pictures on window-panes, and then simply because she cannot help herself, she sets down a description of these pictures. There are, in all, in her new book, "Real People and Dreams," about eighty poems and thirty-two short stories and sketches. This is the work of a genius.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a new photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster, herself, and with illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Make your choice desserts with Carnation Milk

Whether they are plain or fancy, the pure healthful quality of Carnation Milk will make them deliciously tempting.

Add an equal amount of pure water to Carnation Milk and you "bring it back" to its original full-milk state. If you have been using skimmed milk for cooking, simply add more water to reduce the richness.

Our new recipe book gives over one hundred every day and special uses.

Carnation Frozen Pudding
2 tall cans Carnation Milk, 2 cups water, 4 eggs, 2 cups sugar, 2 teaspoonfuls vanilla, ¼ teaspoonful salt. Heat one can of Carnation Milk and the water in a double boiler. Beat eggs and sugar and pour into heated milk; mix well and cook in double boiler, stirring constantly until mixture thickens on a spoon like cream. Remove from fire, cool, add vanilla, and the other can of Carnation Milk. Freeze. This makes about two quarts. Garnish with berries or fruit when served.

"JUST DAVID"

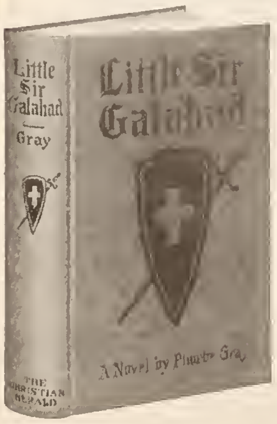
By Eleanor H. Porter

Author of "Pollyanna"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by $1.00. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2 00.



"LITTLE SIR GALAHAD"

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

We will send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad," postpaid, to any present subscriber, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription accompanied by $1.50. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for one year, and send a copy of "Little Sir Galahad" for $2.00.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leagu

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League. All correspondents are specially requested to make their letters as brief as possible. Write requests and acknowledgments on separate sheets.

MRS. H. W., of Cincinnati, Ohio, writes to acknowledge answer to prayer for a loved one who was in great trouble. She writes: "I was worried and prayed for peace and assurance that all would be right. That evening word came that everything had been settled as we would have had it."

A daughter writes from Noble, Ill.: "I want to thank the Prayer League for what it has done for me. A few weeks ago I asked prayer for my father who was about to undergo an operation. He has improved so much that an operation is not necessary."

Mrs. E. C. K., of Walla Walla, Wash., writes: "I sent a request for the prayers of God's believing children for the recovery from heart trouble of a dear wife and mother. I thank our dear Heavenly Father she is well, and it surely was through only the Divine healing, for she was not at the time under any doctor's care."

H. Y. writes from San Jose, Cal.:

Last Fall when very sick with pleurisy and on the verge of having pneumonia, a friend brought the Christian Herald to me, and while perusing its pages the thought came to me that if I would get up in the name of Jesus I believe he would heal me. I did so keeping on praying to the Lord for strength, and he heard my prayer. Later again I was healed of severe pains in chest just by prayer. Through these experiences I received faith to pray for a long standing trouble that doctors could not cure. It was not dangerous, but required continual attention, and now I am completely healed. Praise be unto his name. Through this I was strengthened spiritually and I fear nothing, but commit all things in his hands, and know that he will bring them to pass.

A daughter writes from Burlington, Vt.:

I wish to ask prayers for my aged father in his eighty-fifth year. He believes in Christianity but does not claim to be a Christian. Won't you please pray that he may be saved, and acknowledge Christ as his Saviour before he leaves this world? I wrote you once to pray for an orphan niece and the prayer was wonderfully answered.

W. (from Scranton, Pa.) writes:

Please pray that my husband may feel the need of a Saviour, that mother may not become totally blind and that I may be cured of asthma. After many days I can write that certain problems are now being solved for which I am truly thankful.

A believer in prayer writes from Stanton, Va.:

In October I wrote to the Prayer League asking prayers for a revival in Waynesboro. There were forty conversions, besides a spirit of brotherly love over the whole town. At the same time I asked you to pray that I might be cured of rheumatism, from which I have been a sufferer for eight years. I suffered greatly all winter and was gradually growing helpless, when I was directed to a specialist who has greatly benefitted me. I feel like a different person now."

A grandmother writes from Bloomington, Ill.:

"I sent a request to pray for my grandson who was threatened with tuberculosis. Your prayer was answered and I thank and praise God for it. Please continue to pray for him. He shows signs of being overcome by the drink habit." A mother writes from East Cranby, Conn.: "In a recent letter to you I asked your prayers to the dear Lord for the relief of my son who was in trouble. I am now happy to say your prayers have been answered. I wish to ask your continued prayers for his health, also that he may overcome the desire for intoxicating liquor, which I think he is trying hard to do."

F. E. S., of Grand Rapids, Mich., writes:

Some time ago I wrote requesting prayers for my sister who had been sick for several years. God has answered our prayers and she is much improved. She has been converted to Christ; so has another member of the family. Kindly pray that all of the fami soon learn to know the only true Go that Jesus may be the head of our hon

For the Strengthening of the Churches

MINISTERS and laymen, and among the latter many experts in the field of advertising, will get together in connection with the convention of the Associated Ad Clubs of the World, Philadelphia, June 27-28, for what is probably the first conference of the kind on the subject of church publicity. To these conferences the Associated Ad Clubs invite delegates from churches and other religious organizations. It costs but a dollar for a delegate to register and attend the three sessions of the conference. It will be a new and beneficial thing for churches to send their pastors or other representatives as delegates. The church publicity headquarters will be at the Covington Hotel, 38th and Chestnut Streets. Of course, accommodations can be secured elsewhere also, but ministers and laymen intending to take advantage of this important conference should promptly register as delegates at headquarters. The program of the three departmental sessions devoted to church publicity will be found below.

Methodist General Conference

the convening of this Conference. These included Bishops Hartzell and Scott, who are retired because of the age limit, and in their places the Conference elected Rev. Eben Samuel Johnson, and Rev. Alexander Priestly Camphor (colored).

The Closing Moments

A DRAMATIC moment occurred during the last days of the Conference when the presiding officer's table and chair were auctioned off for $3,200. These finely carved pieces had been made by the boys of the Methodist School in Venice. The purchase price of $3,200, together with other gifts which increased the amount to $5,100, went to the support of this school. The purchaser of the table and chair was F. M. Arter, a business man of Cleveland.

A notable body of men it was that sat day after day for a month under the president's gavel in the great Convention Hall. There were many keen minds and great speeches. There were many dialects, and representatives from all parts of the world were present. The old heresy about preachers' sons was given a death blow when a member asked how many were eligible to join a "Preachers' Kids Club," and it was found that one hundred and forty-one of the delegates were preachers' sons or daughters.

Both in its personnel and its achievements this General Conference undoubtedly was, as a large number of the old-timers were heard to declare, by far the greatest that Methodism has known.

A Correction Willingly Made

THE Rev. H. G. Mendenhall of New York, Moderator of the Presbytery of New York, writes to the Christian Herald as follows:

> As a fellow member of the Religious Press Club as well as examiner of candidates for the ministry in our presbytery, I am writing you in regard to the editorials in the Christian Herald of April 26 and May 3, entitled "Ministerial Fitness" and "Undermining the Faith." While the tone of these articles is excellent, true and courageous, I must beg leave to differ with you on the premise which has called them forth, viz: the purported examination of candidates at our last meeting of presbytery. The reports in the secular papers were misleading and did not state the facts. Not one of these three candidates denied the resurrection of our Lord; on the other hand, all affirmed it in the most positive terms. They did not deny the miracles of Christ; but affirmed them, including the raising of Lazarus. The "Story of Jonah" was not mentioned in the examination. They did not deny the Virgin Birth of Jesus; but, quoting from one of the candidates, they "did not affirm it with the same confidence they affirmed the historical facts of the resurrection." They, however, affirmed their belief in the preexistence of Christ as a person; in his deity as the Eternal Son of God, and in his incarnation as Jesus of Nazareth. They "accepted as fundamental to the Christian Gospel those truths which the doctrine of the Virgin Birth is intended to express and conserve; namely, the complete humanity and the complete deity of Christ."
> These young men were examined by a committee of sixteen men, only four of whom have or have had any affiliation with the seminary from which these candidates graduated. "There was (no) sharp tilt in presbytery between the representatives of the old and the new school theologies." On the other hand, there was a quiet spiritual influence which made for solemnity, and after the young men had answered the questions for licensure, one of our ministers, who is a weekly contributor to your columns, led us in prayer, and when the licensure was effected, the members of presbytery, standing around these young men, joined in singing, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

When Baby Plays

When she gets hold of a lead pencil, for instance and "writes" all over the white paint that's so hard to keep clean anyway! Don't get cross! It only means a damp cloth and Fels-Naptha Soap. In a jiffy, without hard rubbing, the pencil marks will disappear; smudgy finger marks too—and all kinds of dirt.

There's nothing better than Fels-Naptha for getting bathtubs clean, either. No hard scrubbing to get rid of that greasy scum that will collect—just wipe out the tubs, basins or bowls with a damp cloth and Fels-Naptha Soap. You'll be surprised at their shining whiteness. Fels-Naptha dissolves grease, softens dirt and makes it disappear.

Let baby have her wash-day too—it will make her so happy to copy Mama's way of washing. And Dolly's clothes do get dirty. If Mama washes with Fels-Naptha Soap she knows how easy work can be. With Fels-Naptha there's no hard rubbing—no long boiling. Just soak the clothes with Fels-Naptha Soap for about 30 minutes. When you come to wash, the hard part's done. The dirt rolls out with a few light rubs. You get the clothes on the line in half the time, sweeter and cleaner than ever before.

It's the perfect combination of soap with naptha, that makes Fels-Naptha the "wonder soap." Wonderful because it does every soap-and-water household task perfectly, quickly and easily. Cuts out all hard work—cuts the time in half.

Berry Time

Doubles the Use of Puffed Grains
Six for Every Berry

These bubbles of grain—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—belong in each dish of berries.

Mix in six for every berry.

As a shortcake needs crust, so berries need these airy, flavory morsels—as a blend.

Float Them In Milk

Every milk bowl calls for Puffed Grains. For these are whole grains. They are toasted. They are flaky, thin and crisp.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size. So they float on milk like bubbles.

They are steam-exploded—easy to digest. All the millions of food cells are broken.

The fearful heat has given them a fascinating flavor.

Imagine how these tissue-thin, toasted globules add to the joys of a milk dish. And the outer grain coats—most needed by young folks—are not lacking in these foods, remember.

Puffed Wheat Except in Far West 12c
Puffed Rice 15c
Corn Puffs—Bubbles of Corn Hearts—15c

Don't serve for breakfast only. There is many a way to enjoy them. And in this form these grains yield all that Nature gave them.

These are puffed by Prof. Anderson's process. The grains are shot from guns. Every food cell is exploded. Every atom feeds.

These are not mere cereal dainties. They are scientific foods. And in summertime your pantry shelf should be kept supplied with all.

Merry Moments

WHERE WAS THE VERGER? There was once an excellent clergyman—the rector of a parish—a very godly man, but an exceedingly dull and uninteresting preacher. When he read the prayers of the Church service he always closed his eyes. Noticing this peculiarity, his curate, who was a witty young wag, wrote the following epigram:

"I never see my rector's eyes
He hides their light divine;
For when he prays, he shuts his own,
And, when he preaches, mine!"
(Contributor please communicate.)

HE PROVED IT. During the recitation of a college class in natural philosophy, the Professor observed a tall, lanky youth in a rear seat, his head drooping, his body relaxed, his eyes half closed, and his legs encumbering an adjacent aisle.

"Mr. Frazer," said the professor.

The freshman opened his eyes slowly but did not change his pose.

"Mr. Frazer, what is work?"

"Everything is work," was the drawling reply.

"Sir," exclaimed the professor, "do you mean to tell me that is a reasonable answer to my question?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then I take it that you would like me and the class to believe that this desk is work?"

"Yes, sir," replied the youth wearily; "it is woodwork."

HE KNEW. We were at the supper table when four-year-old Dorothy suddenly asked, "Mamma, what is a stork?" Seven-year-old Gordon, who has had to help a good deal in caring for the two littlest ones, promptly replied, "A pest."

BUT HE'S NOT A PILGRIM. A little farmer lad of four, thus described a woodchuck: "His head is red, but the rest of him is plymouth rock."

COULD HE ARREST A COLD? A man was appointed detective for a railroad company, and he showed his authority at every opportunity. While riding in a coach one day, he heard a little boy behind him sniffling.

The detective turned to him and said, "Have you a pocket handkerchief, my little man?"

The boy replied, "Yes, sir, but mamma said I shouldn't loan it to everybody."

FLASHES OF FUN. Ethel used to play a good deal in Sunday school, but one day she had been so good that the teacher said in praise,

"Ethel, my dear, you have been a very good girl, today."

"Yeth'm," responded Ethel. "I couldn't help it. I dot a stiff neck."—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

ON Sunday afternoon, May 21, the Y. M. C. A. of Chicago dedicated the tallest Y. M. C. A. building in the world, the new eighteen story Y. M. C. A. hotel on Wabash Ave., near Eighth Street. The hotel is designed to provide self-respecting young men, who have come to the city to make their way, or who are temporarily out of an employment, with clean, well-ventilated rooms, worth-while comradeship, and wholesome environment. All unnecessary expense is eliminated and rooms are furnished for 30, 40 and 50 cents a day. The hotel operates a cafeteria and a lunch counter and in addition to rest, recreation, reading and writing rooms, there is a rear lobby seating 500 in which motion pictures and interesting lectures, many of them illustrated, provide clean amusement each evening. This lobby is used for religious meetings, as well, and provision is made on Sunday for guides to accompany the men to the various churches. The hotel is not intended to furnish men with a permanent home, but only to serve them while they gain a foothold in the city. A free employment service is operated in connection with the hotel.

You have until July 17th to mail in our answers; that's plenty of time if you act this moment. If ou delay you positively will not have time to compete well. et your order into the mail today. Don't let another night ind you still delaying. We will send your Outfit by return nail—arouse yourself and mail in your order!

"I Have Waited Until Now to Begin

e Bible Picture Contest because I knew I would not need a longer period of time in which to find verses in the short list for the pictures, and I preferred to wait until I had all the pictures before me at once. Now I want my Outfit and all the pictures. I intend to interest myself hugely for the next month solving pictures."

The above is typical of many letters received

and have just as interesting a time, and just as much opportunity to excel.

YOU'LL undoubtedly have more time than you will need to solve every picture to your entire satisfaction. Why, all you have to do is to spread the sixty pictures out in front of you on the sitting room table, look at each one, familiarize yourself with them, and then go slowly through your "Gems from the Bible" (the 2,000 Bible verses from which to choose those that fit the pictures). As you come to a verse that seems applicable to a picture, make a note of the verse on a slip of paper. Then, when you've gone through the "Gems" and picked out all the verses that caught your eye, discard the poorer verses, and write in your Reply Book the verses that in your opinion really fit the pictures best. Send in your Reply Book by July 17th (it will be all right even if mailed on that day), and those submitting the best titles will be awarded the 419 cash rewards.

The Judges

who will designate the best verses for the pictures, from among all the verses submitted by contestants, are:

PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D. D.,
Dean of Moody Bible Institute.

HON. P. P. CLAXTON,
United States Commissioner of Education.

R. WILBERT W. WHITE, D. D.,

Why Villa Isn't Caught

AN American writer whose reports and photographs of conditions in the Philippines, Haiti, Mexico and other countries during revolutions have been widely read in the United States, but whose identity for a very special reason cannot be disclosed at this moment, gives us the personal statement by Villa which appears below and which was secured by this writer during a period of rather close intimacy with the various leaders in Mexico. As he has had unusually good opportunities to study the Mexican situation, his brief analysis of the situation which follows the Villa interview is both timely and interesting.

I DON'T even speak my own language clearly. I was born near Chihuahua. My father was a poor peon, illiterate. I remember little of him. I just grew up as most poor Mexican boys do, in filth and ignorance. Even as a boy I was quarrelsome and physically far superior to most Mexican boys. My home was wrecked, my people robbed, and my sisters despoiled by soldiers and bands of lawless Mexicans, and I finally became a bandit. I have been a convict also" (frowning ferociously.) "I believe it is a crime to let the rich get richer and the poor poorer each year. I have robbed, but it was always those that deserved or could afford to be robbed, and I always gave a great share of the spoils to the poor. . . . I am not fit to stand at the head of my country's affairs, or attempt to rule or govern. I leave that to those who are fitted. As to Carranza—who knows?" (A shrug of the shoulders) "It will be hard to pick a man wise enough, brave enough, and honest enough to rule Mexico." (When next the writer saw Villa, the latter and Carranza had separated.) "Dog!" he hissed; "he isn't fit to rule. Mark my words; should he ever be successful and defeat me, which is impossible, he couldn't rule any length of time. For two reasons: first, he hasn't got the interest of his country at heart; and second, he hasn't the confidence of the better class of Mexicans. But no matter who was in power or how distasteful or unpopular the government, Mexico would unite and fight any common enemy. No matter what the cause, or how serious the provocation, just let any foreign power step one foot on Mexican soil, and all factions, no matter what their own beliefs, grievances, or quarrels, would immediately forget everything in their endeavor to repel an invading force."

CARRANZA isn't the only one to reckon with. There are thousands of poor peons, and illiterate Mexicans who will flock to Villa, who know their own country with its hundreds of hiding places in the mountainous passes. Other factions hating Carranza realize that now is their time to disrupt the government. It means a veritable game of hide and seek. Villa can badger and torment our troops and wage a savage guerrilla warfare that will cost many lives and entail millions of expense. Should Carranza factions join hands with Villa, it would mean a war far more serious than the average American realizes.

You may say what you please of the ignorance and poor marksmanship of the Mexican soldier, but you cannot question his courage. I have seen Villa personally lead charge after charge against Federals in strongly intrenched positions and in the face of the deadliest of fire; charge the trenches and engage the enemy hand to hand. What he lacks in intelligence he makes up in personal magnetism, ferocious energy, and ability to lead his ragged followers into the jaws of hell. An excellent horseman, muscles like iron, and practically tireless, he knows every foot of the mountains in and around Chihuahua, and with thousands of friendly spies it will be practically impossible to capture him. So large is the area to be covered, small detachments of his men can swoop down and inflict heavy damage on an invading force. Facts that most people do not know and which would perhaps be hard to prove, are that certain foreign powers, expecting large concessions of all kinds should certain factions friendly to them be in power in Mexico, are furnishing large sums to finance revolutionary bodies, and there is in reality no man strong enough to rule Mexico.

The ignorant do not care who or what they are fighting for. They only know they are fighting; but one thing is certain, they will forget all previous differences to fight the hated gringos. They haven't forgotten.

Artillery will play an infinitesimal part in this struggle. To the cavalry will fall the bulk of the work, although the jackass batteries and the machine guns will be kept busy. Villa is far too foxy to attempt to make a stand, but will devote his time to harassing the invading lines with frequent sallies against the railway lines and border patrols. Should factions all drop their differences and unite in repelling our forces, their first act will be to entirely destroy the Mexican National railroad line, and without that it is practically impossible to make any progress. This means corps of trained railroad builders, mechanics, engineers, and time and millions. If our only intention is to capture Villa, it is safe to say he is the most costly bandit any nation ever pursued.

Kitchener of Khartum

T late Field Marshal Earl ratio Herbert Kitchener

WHEN in August of 1914 the light of peace was lost and war clouds darkened Europe, and England awakened to the danger that threatened Albion's shores, the empire sought for a man—a man, if perchance there were such a one, as big as the emergency and as potent as the danger. Two figures immediately arose before the minds of government an people alike: Lord Roberts, and Kitchener of K rtum. But General Roberts was past the age fo ctive service, and it was Earl Kitchener who was ca d to the War Office and who was charged with th duty of creating a British army equal to the dema d upon the empire.

F ELD MARSHAL HORATIO HERBERT KITCHENER was a son of Colonel Henry H atio Kitchener of the Thirteenth Light Dragoons. H was born in Ireland, but no Irish blood was in i veins. Just before he was twenty he went on a oliday from the Royal Military Academy at W lwich to visit his father, then residing at Dinan in rance. The Franco-Prussian war of 1870 was be g fought. Without his father's knowledge or co ent young Kitchener enlisted in the armies of Fr ce, his service being cut short by an attack of pn umonia. On his recovery his father obtained his di harge. He returned to Woolwich and in January, 18 , entered the British army as a second lieutenant, be nning his service in Palestine and Cyprus. In 18 he was detailed to Egypt, where he was appointed a ajor of cavalry in the Egyptian army and began a orough study of the Egyptian character. In 18 he was attached to the expedition which atte pted to relieve General Gordon, who was besieged in Khartum. The expedition failed and Chinese G don was finally overwhelmed. During the next fe years Kitchener was winning fame and advancing in nk in the process of extending British rule in the Su n, being severely wounded in 1888, when a bullet pi ced his jaw.

1892, after having participated with Sir Francis G nfell in crushing the Dervishes, Kitchener was na ed Sirdar, or commander-in-chief, of the Egyptian ar y, which he completely reorganized for the final co quest of the Sudan. On September 2, 1898, at O durman, across the Nile from Khartum, with 20 00 men Kitchener fought 50 00 Mahdists, killing 11,000, wo nding 16,000 and capturing 4,0 with a total loss to his own fo s of less than 500 men. The Ba le of Omdurman marked the fin subjugation of the Sudanese tri s, and the recapture of Khartu —which had been a British sh ne ever since the death there of G don—made Kitchener's place se re in the minds and hearts of E ishmen, and made him Kitchen of Khartum from that day fo ard.

T Omdurman was not to be the last triumph of Kitchener in ne Valley of the Nile. Pressin onward, he found at Fashoda a ench expedition under Capta Marchand, who had pushed fo ard to the Nile, determined to ise there the flag of France. K hener's first step in the nego ations was to send to Captain M chand a full hamper of good th gs to eat. While for a time th atening to involve France a England in a world war th ughout their various dom ons, the Fashoda incident fin ly yielded to diplomacy, and M chand and his Senegalese wa iors withdrew. But France had gained another hero, while the glory of England's hero remained undimmed.

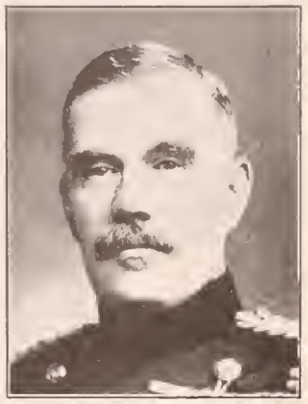
For his services in Egypt, Kitchener was raised to the peerage and made first Earl Kitchener of Khartum. Kitchener's next important service for the crown was in the Transvaal, where by organizing a system of blockhouses which hemmed in the Boers, and a series of well-organized drives which wore them out, and by initiating in the British army a species of rigorous discipline by which British officers under his energetic influence either worked hard or were sent home, victory was at last led to perch upon the banners of the empire, and the brave little republics, beaten though not defeated, became, as history since 1914 has shown, a not unimportant part of the Union of South Africa.

After peace had been restored in South Africa, Kitchener was sent to India as commander-in-chief, where he reorganized the army regardless of the opposition of the viceroy, Lord Curzon, who found it exceedingly unprofitable to disagree with Kitchener. Lord Curzon cabled to London that he would resign if Kitchener were not recalled, Kitchener remained, but there was a new viceroy.

AT about this time Lord Roseberry described Lord Kitchener as a general with a dash of statesmanship, and Lord Balfour said that he was an organizer of men whose foresight was never at fault. Both these estimates of Kitchener of Khartum have been borne out and fulfilled in his work since he was called to the War Office in August of 1914.

When appointed War Minister, Kitchener found available for service in France an army of about 200,000 men. When asked how long the war would last, Kitchener at that time said, "Not less than three years." And later, after the Germans had been turned back from the Marne, and the western line had settled down at about its present situation, Kitchener said, in answer to another question, that the war would begin in May of 1915. In the meantime, he was using all his experience and prestige and ability in the creation of a great army which should be worthy of the military traditions of Britain. He found the supply of ammunition extremely short. There were not even supplies on hand sufficient for the ordinary needs of the British army, and artillery ammunition was more scarce than the rest.

Kitchener worked hard, and Britons came at his call from every quarter of the far-flung empire. Not always at his first call, but eventually, Kitchener got the men he wanted. In eighteen months Kitchener had increased the British army available for foreign service from 200,000 to nearly 5,000,000, of whom about a million men had come from the over-seas dominions. He had organized the munitions industry of Great Britain so that in March, 1915, he dared to give the orders which were looked upon as the opening of the war which he had predicted.



Gen. W. R. Robertson, Chief of Staff, English Army

For three days at Neuve Chapelle the British guns worked havoc in the German lines, and then Kitchener's new army moved forward, disregarding terrible losses, until it had swarmed over three lines of enemy entrenchments, and Britain rejoiced in a great victory, which was to be but the beginning of the backward march of the Germans toward their native Rhine.

But for some reason the Germans did not make that precipitate return which the British public had expected, and a storm of criticism burst about the War Office and about Kitchener of Khartum. It seemed as if the national idol was to fall amid a storm of recrimination and accusation. It was charged that Kitchener had not realized the necessity for high explosive shells, and that he had placed too much reliance on shrapnel; that no further progress could be made until the British artillery was able to fire at least shot for shot of high explosive shells against the enemy.

In May, 1915, the public demand for action was recognized, the Ministry of Munitions was established, the cabinet was remade, but Kitchener remained in the War Office. Gradually, as Lloyd George worked out the details of the complete organization of the empire for the production of the necessary shells, and Kitchener created and inspired new units of fighting men, the storm of May, 1915, was forgotten, and Kitchener's light burned steadily again as the national hero, the man who was to save Britain from her enemies.

IT has been said that Kitchener was responsible for the defense of Paris in the early days of September, 1914, panic having seized upon the French cabinet, which was only stayed when Kitchener threatened to withdraw the English army and leave France to fight it out alone if Paris were given up without a fight. After the Dardanelles expedition had fought its sorry battle, with great bravery against great odds but with little useful results, it was Kitchener's inspection and final judgment that brought about the abandonment of this hopeless venture. Busy as he was in the creation of the army which will always be known as "Kitchener's Army," he yet found time to give the allies of Great Britain the benefit of his experience and ripe judgment.

And now Kitchener is gone, and England asks, "Who will see this matter through?" The answer is not yet, but it is thought that Sir William Robertson, who has been chief of staff under Kitchener, and who has worked up from the ranks to a major-generalship through hard service, will be the man who will lead Britain's armies to the final conclusion of the world war.

ON the evening of June 5, while en route to Russia on board the cruiser Hampshire on what must have been matters of grave importance, Kitchener and seven of his staff were lost in the sinking of the cruiser west of the Orkney Islands, apparently by a floating mine. All on board were lost except one warrant officer and eleven men, who drifted ashore on a raft two days afterward. The full complement of the Hampshire was 655 officers and men. Later reports indicated that but for the Irish crisis Mr. Lloyd George would have been aboard the Hampshire.

Yuan Shi Kai

YUAN SHI KAI, president, emperor and president again, foe of reform and chief reformer when occasion served, supporter, destroyer and creator of dynasties, is dead. On June 5, surrounded by his wives and older children, he left the discord of internal strife and external pressure to other hands. In the Christian Herald of December 29, 1915, the likeness was noted between Yuan's climb to power and that of Julius Cæsar, and we asked the question "Will Yuan have his Brutus?" Dispatches a week before his death indicated that he had been poisoned; but while the fact of the poisoning was officially denied, the fact of his death is sufficient evidence that all was not well, and that this master of men and of intrigue had perhaps suffered, at last, at the hands of that insidious method of removing unwelcome encumbrances, which had not been unknown in the annals of Yuan's rise to power. The cause of death was given as stomach trouble followed by a nervous breakdown.

The monarchy which Yuan sought to establish in December was finally abandoned in March under the pressure of the southern revolution and the increasing disaffection of public men whose loss Yuan could ill afford. On March 22 an edict was promulgated over Yuan's signature at Peking in which he took upon himself all the blame for the errors that had been made, reciting how, against his protest, he had been overborne by an increasing volume of demand, apparently representing the voice of the people, urging upon him the establishment of a monarchy; and how he had at last yielded and had reluctantly accepted the proffered crown, declaring:

"I CARED for nothing but the salvation of the country. A perusal of our history of several thousand years will reveal in vivid manner the sad fate of the descendants of ancient kings and emperors. What, then, could have prompted me to aspire to the throne? Yet, while the representatives of the people were unwilling to believe in the sincerity of my refusal of the offer, a section of the people appear to have suspected me of harboring the desire of gaining more power and privileges. Such difference in thought has resulted in the creation of an exceedingly dangerous situation. As my sincerity has not been such as to win the hearts of the people and my judgment has not been sound enough to appraise every man, I have myself alone to blame for lack of virtue. Why, then, should I blame others? The people have been thrown into misery and my soldiers have been made to bear hardships; and further, the people have been cast into panic and commerce has rapidly declined. When I search my own heart a measure of sorrow fills it. I shall, therefore, not be unwilling to suppress myself in order to yield to others." And the edict closed with these paragraphs, which in themselves are an outline of the history of China and an indication of the basis of her unrest:

"In brief, I now confess that all the faults of the country are the result of my own faults. Now that the acceptance of the imperial throne has been canceled, every man will be responsible for his own action if he further disturbs the peace of the locality and thus gives an opportunity to others. I, the great president, being charged with the duty of ruling over the whole country, cannot remain idle while the country is racing to perdition. At the present moment the homesteads are in misery, discipline has been disregarded, administration is being neglected, and real talents have not been given a chance. When I think of such conditions I awake in the darkness of midnight. How can we stand as a nation if such a state of affairs is allowed to continue?"

According to the dispatches from Peking, the last words of President Yuan Shi Kai were an expression of regret for the monarchical movement which he said had brought disaster to China and had hastened his end. It was reported that he called his former premier to his bedside and whispered, "I did not wish this end. I did not aspire to be emperor. Those around me said the people desired a sovereign and had named me for the throne. I believed, and was misled." From the dying Yuan all pretense fell away, and it may be that, after all, the world has misjudged this man upon whom fell the heavy load of China in transition.

AT the promulgation of the monarchy, Li Yuan Hung, who had been elected vice-president, withdrew from the Court and refused to have any part in the new government. On the return to the republican form Li returned to his position as vice-president, and upon the death of Yuan the premier, Tuan Chi Jui, as the official representative of the Chinese Republic, immediately advised Li of his succession to the presidency. Li Yuan Hung took the presidential oath on June 7.

The Outlook Under China's New President

By H. K. KWONG, President of the Chinese Students' Alliance in America

MONARCHICAL government was urged upon China six months ago for fear of internal dissension at presidential elections. The coming into power of President Li Yuan Hung at the death of Yuan Shi Kai is the happiest solution today of the bitter political struggle which has thrown China into tumult. This marks a new era, because it sounds the death knell of monarchism. The reported confession of President Yuan Shi Kai that he was misled regarding the people's views on monarchical government is significant, because it proves for all time that China, having once drunk from the cup of popular freedom, will not be satisfied with a mockery of crowns and thrones. It is a sign of warning that this is a forbidden fruit which not even the "strong man" of China may touch.

China is on the road to peace and order. The whole nation is tired of fighting and plotting. It wants peace to develop commerce and industry systematically. And now at its head is a man who in the four years of his meteoric political career has always exercised his influence on the side of harmony. In the midst of the hottest fighting in the first revolution, 1911, President Li urged the settlement of the conflict by a conference, which deposed the Manc s. And when a break between President Yuan Shi i and the southern Republicans threatened in 1912 e threw his influence for moderation.

The Republicans will be willing to talk peace. t was for the purpose of overthrowing President Y n Shi Kai, whom they charged with high treason r inspiring the monarchical movement, that the so - ern provinces rose in arms. It was a fight for e sacred principles of liberty and equality. With is fight the people of China are in deep sympa y. President Yuan, who, the Republicans said, was e leader of this movement, is dead. The republ n doctrine is apparently safe in the hands of Presi t Li, whose sympathy for representative government s never been doubted.

President Li is the Republican choice for e presidency. He was elected by the seceding provi s even before the death of President Yuan. He car o this office in accordance with the constitution. I s- much as the Republicans rose in revolt, braving d h and hardships, for the preservation of the constitu n, surely they would not now disregard it when it n their power to safeguard it.

Another strong consideration for peace and o r is the Japanese menace. China can not afford to e her neighbor any excuse for intervention. Int al dissension is the best invitation. The Republi s realized it when they raised the banner of revolu n. But to them the peril of Yuan's monarchical amb n was immensely greater.

The question of monarchy or republic, they t, must be settled at once or never. China could n e united so long as Yuan, whom they considere s having betrayed the republic, was in power. T re would always be war between the Monarchists an e Republicans. The whole energy of the country w ld be centered on the problem to the neglect of all ot s. China would remain disorganized, impotent d humiliated. It was therefore vastly better to d le the issue, hoping to defeat the Monarchists with e overwhelming sentiment of the country for Re b- licanism, and to start China in a new direction.

Such was the logic of the revolution. Yuan is w removed. The Japanese menace can no lo er be ignored. The Japanese government a statement to the world has declared at it would let China alone for the e being. During the crisis of the Ja n- ese demands last year, the Repub n leaders declared that they w ld not do anything that would hi er President Yuan in his negotiat s. Now is another occasion for t m to put patriotism above p y differences. The whole cou ry should come together to n ke reparation for the time los in the march of progress in the st four years.

Peace, however, will not c e unless followers of Presi nt Yuan are, in their turn, willi to treat with the Republicans. e concessions must be real and b- stantial. The Republican go u- ment must be established on a f n- dation so sound that there will n er be danger of its being tampered h. President Li, by virtue of his o e, will be a dominating factor in bri g this about. His statesmanship and r- sightedness are the best guarantee for e unity of China.

Li Yuan Hung

THE Republican and Progressive Conventions convened in Chicago on Wednesday, June 7, the Republicans in the great Coliseum, the Progressives in the Auditorium. It was raining. The sky was overcast, leaden, just such discouraging and dispiriting weather as Chicago in her worst mood is noted for. And the pall seemed to have penetrated the Coliseum, for the convention which had met there was quiet, undemonstrative, unenthusiastic; yet underneath there was determination to choose a candidate upon whom all the scattered elements of Republicanism might unite.

The Progressive Convention in the auditorium was not so burdened. It was all enthusiasm. It had met for a definite purpose. It knew but one leader and it cheered his name for 93 minutes. It was willing to unite with the Republicans upon that leader, yet not willing to consider uniting upon any other.

The managers of the two conventions planned to bring them together. Mr. Roosevelt was admitted to be the author of the issues upon which the campaign of 1916 should be fought. The Republican platform as adopted was a purely Rooseveltian platform. With the adoption of the platform, the Republican Convention began showing a little of the old enthusiasm. Through Wednesday and Thursday they had been waiting around while the leaders worked out the details of the union that they hoped would be. The Republicans were not willing to hold out the olive branch to the Progressives. They insisted that the Progressives should make the first move in the attempted reconciliation. Late on Thursday afternoon word reached the Republican Convention that the Progressive Convention had asked for a conference. With that announcement, the pent up feelings of the Republican delegates broke loose, and the conference committee was appointed amid an enthusiastic demonstration.

The Conference committees of the two conventions met almost at once and conferred throughout the night of Thursday, conferred without reaching a decision. The Progressive conferees had but one candidate, the Colonel himself. Senator Borah, one of the Republican conferees a an earnest advocate of the nomination of J ce Hughes, admitted that Roosevelt was wo r- fully equipped, but the Republican con es held that as their conve on had not yet voted they ld not present a candidat or the consideration of he Progressives, and they re not willing to present R se- velt to the Republicans til a ballot had been taken.

Automobiling in the Wilds of the Yukon

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

ONE hundred miles through the wilds of the Yukon in a high-powered motor car!

Dashing through the virgin forest in $500 automobile!

Sl ding round the cliffs with your heart in our hroat, your soul full of thrills and your ackbone chilled to the marrow!

T se are some of the experiences I have just d ith Mr. Herbert Wheeler, the general an er of the White Pass and Yukon route on he erland trail from White Horse to Dawson. he hauffeur was "Caterpillar" Ike and the ime as from midday to midnight.

T overland trail begins at White Horse and ns through the wilderness for a distance of 50 iles to the mouth of the Klondike. It is he ort cut across country from here to the old ines, and is more than 100 miles less than he y there by river. The road is used to carry ail passengers and freight during the cold int months when everything in this region is ek tight by Jack Frost, and the thermometer t ties falls to seventy degrees below zero.

T road has been cut right through the forest. t cnbs over ranges of mountains, it winds its ay hrough the valleys and it crosses swamps, ogs and sloughs of glacial mud. Here it is edd on the rock, there it half floats on the uicsand, upheld by corduroy logs. In the pri of the year the six-horse teams of the ai tage are often mired to their bellies, and av o be lifted from the waxy clay by a block d ckle attached to the trees.

T whole trip was a moving picture of the on rs of nature. Outside the roadway the our y is the same as it was when Columbus isc ered America; the same as when the ar drifted down our coast, about 1000 A.D. es venture, the same as when old Cheops built is st pyramid on the banks of the Nile. With he ception of several roadhouses—log huts that av been put up to give meals to travelers—we aw o sign of human habitation, and excepting the oa old and new, not one mark of human effort r rk. We were in no danger of meeting other ac nes or farm wagons, although we might have un own a covey of birds instead of the usual chicken, r ox or a bear in place of a dog. At one time a yn ounded in front of our machine from one side f t road to the other, and at another a great flock f g use passed with a whirr over our heads.

V saw all sorts of tracks as we rode over the trail. The oods are full of wild game. There are bears, ro n and black; caribou in great numbers, and wide-ant ed moose. There are foxes and lynx and mil-ion of rabbits. We passed groves of small trees, ve one of which had been killed by the rabbits. Th had eaten the bark off during the winter when he ow was two or three feet in depth. They would it t away inch by inch as the snow melted, and a tri of white a yard long could be seen girdling each re The bark above and below was dark green or ro n, and the white strips shone out like ivory aga st the green leaves of the bushes.

WE are accustomed to think of this part of the world as all snow and ice. This is so in the wir r, but in the summer the whole country is like a b anical garden and spotted with flowers. During thi ide we passed great beds of fireweed, and motored for iles between hedges of pink flowers, higher than the heels of the automobile. The woods where the orest fires had passed through were dusted with pink blossoms. There were so many wild flowers that I attempted to count them in an open place where we stopped to put on a new tire. I had picked nineteen varieties before the job was completed.

One of the gasoline tank stoves that warm this roadhouse

Another curiosity was the air plants. I have always thought of orchids as confined to the tropics. There are polar orchids in this part of the world, great bunches of green that hang high up in the trees. They are of a hue different from that of the branches.

We crossed one little glacial river after another, and rode through valleys which are covered with ice in the winter, and become a souplike slough in the spring. A great part of the way was over what is known as glacial clay, a kind of earth that will have much to do with the railroad Uncle Sam is now building. This clay is solid when dry, but when moist it assumes the consistency of shoemakers' wax and, like a quicksand, sucks in anything that goes over it. If a railroad track is built on it and not well protected by drainage, it may disappear during a long rainy season or where the water of a creek or river has seeped its way through.

The whole of the soil here, and this is true also of a great part of Alaska, rests upon a bed of ice or frozen earth which has been in that state for thousands of years. The moss on the top of the soil acts as an insulator, and keeps the ice from melting except on the surface. Indeed, you can dig down almost anywhere and strike the ice bed. There are places where the soil is so thin that you can scratch away the moss with your fingers and come to the ice. Where the earth below is glacial clay it is sound while the moss covers it, but when that is taken away and water runs in, the clay will uphold neither man nor horse.

THE Overland trail crosses glacial clay here and there, and the labor of keeping it in order reminds one of that of Hercules in cleaning the Augean stables. The track has had to be filled in and remade again and again. The route is changed from year to year. Every now and then we passed an old roadbed which was so filled with boulders that a man could hardly crawl over it. At places we motored over glacial spots where the roadbed rose and fell under the weight of the machine. The country had had no rain for three months, and during the day previous enough rain had fallen to change the whole face of nature. It had affected this glacial clay and turned parts of it to the consistency of putty. Our automobile weighed over two tons, and we had to go carefully where there was any question as to the character of the clay. At one wet spot we found ourselves down on the axles, with the wheels tied fast in the mud. We had to dig out the wheels and make a place to jack up the car. We had an axe and a long-handled shovel with us with a view to such accidents, and we cut down trees and made a bed of branches in front of the car. We put a pine track under the wheels and used a pine tree as a lever to aid the jack in getting the car out of the mud. It took us about two hours to dig the machine out of the clay and start it on the firm roadbed. After that we turned out and sought new roads through the grass, and rushed over the wet spots to prevent the car sinking. In some places the movement of the road as we went over it was as though we were riding over a blanket or rubber sheet. Those places were underlaid with glacial mud.

The Canadian government has already spent a great deal on the road and its upkeep costs some thousands of dollars per annum. Within the past few years it has been made more and more fit for automobiles. The first time an automobile road was proposed the opponents of the measure scoffed at the idea and said that it could not be done. The matter came up before the parliament at Ottawa and it was discussed pro and con. An appropriation of $50,000 had been proposed for the purpose. The objections were made that automobiles could not be run in the low temperature of the Yukon, and that the road was so rough that the machines could never make it. While the discussion was going on the Hon. George Black, who was then commissioner, or governor, of Yukon territory, decided to show parliament that the undertaking was possible. He thereupon made an arrangement with C. A. Thomas, the resident manager of the Yukon Gold Company at Dawson, to take his forty-horsepower automobile over the trail.

They made the trip to White Horse and return within fifty-six hours, of which thirty-six hours was continual running. This covered a distance of 720 miles, and was an average speed of twenty miles an hour for the running time of the round trip. During the journey the thermometer fell to 56° below zero.

They had to keep the machine going, for a few minutes' rest would freeze the engine and congeal the oil. At one time they had to stop because their gasoline had given out, within twenty miles of a roadhouse which they had expected to reach. They had to get a dog team and send on to the roadhouse. While they waited the engine froze and the oil got stiff, and they had to build a fire under the car with wood from the forest before they could start off again.

The news of their trip was telegraphed to Ottawa and the bill was passed.

AMERICAN MARINES IN ACTION. The United States marine corps is meeting considerable resistance in stifling the revolution in Santo Domingo. On June 4 while a party of marines, under Major Charles B. Hatch, was landing at Puerto Plata, Captain Hirshinger was killed by a stray shot, but there was no organized resistance, the Dominican rebels entrenching on the outskirts of the city and awaiting developments. In order properly to handle the situation another regiment of marines under Colonel J. H. Pendleton was at once dispatched to Puerto Plata. There are now 2,000 marines on the island of Haiti in the republics of Haiti and Santo Domingo. On June 6, Dominican rebels attacked a marine camp at Monte Christi. Eighteen of the assailants were killed. On the same day, marines and Haitian gendarmes in a surprise attack killed two revolutionary chiefs and nine of their men.

MINISTERIAL FUND HALF RAISED. With the year half gone announcement is made that the church pension fund of $5,000,000 being raised by the Protestant Episcopal Church has been more than half provided for, the treasurer holding either cash or pledges of unquestioned legal and financial validity. Sixty out of sixty-eight dioceses have formally adopted the pension system.

JOHN STREET CHURCH TO GO. The recent General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Saratoga, N. Y., authorized the wrecking of old John Street Church, which has occupied its present site since 1768, although the present building is the third upon the site, and the erection of a business building in which the continuation of the work of the church will be provided for.

COMMISSION PLAN FAILS. After three years' trial the city of Denver, the largest city under the commission form of government, has returned to the old mayoralty system. Instead of five commissioners, the new charter provides for a mayor with a responsible cabinet and a council of nine members.

STORMS TAKE LIFE. Tornadoes in Arkansas, Missouri, Mississippi and Illinois on June 5 killed about 100 persons and injured hundreds more, destroying much property and crippling all means of communication.

AND STILL THEY COME. In spite of the war, immigration into the United States continues. In the first ten months of the present fiscal year, 291,527 immigrants were admitted into the United States; 212,478 aliens left the country, the net increase in population by immigration for the ten months being 79,049. The bulk of these immigrants came from southern Europe, although there were 1,357 Irish, 2,112 Scandinavians, 1,402 English, 2,525 French and 1,055 Germans.

CONFERENCE CONCERNS MILLIONS. On June 1 representatives of the "Big Four" Brotherhoods of Railway men and of the railway companies of the country met in New York to confer on the questions raised by the demand of the unions for a basic eight-hour day and for other changes in the conditions of employment. Both sides were ready with full exhibits and many witnesses. It has been stated that for the railroads to grant the demands of the men in full would mean an additional expense of ninety-five to one hundred millions of dollars a year as well as material changes in methods of operation. To the men it means higher wages and easier hours. Approximately 250 railroads, operating more than 250,000 miles of track with a gross business of more than $3,000,000,000 a year, paying now in wages over $1,375,000,000, are involved. The employees affected exceed 350,000. The railways have made counter demands.

COMPENSATION LAW PROTECTS RESCUERS. The New York State Court of Appeals on June 4 upheld the awarding of damages, under the state compensation law, to the estate of a workman who was killed by a cave-in while attempting to rescue a fellow workman. The employers had held that he was not killed in the ordinary course of his employment. The court held otherwise.

NOW JUSTICE BRANDEIS. Louis D. Brandeis took his seat as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court on June 5.

AMONG THE STRIKERS. The telegraphers still threaten a nation-wide strike, demanding the recognition of their union, a ten per cent. increase in pay and an eight-hour day. The unions, which are now organizing secretly, are said to have a membership of 30,000 in the United States and Canada. The strike in the garment shops of New York City has already resulted in a great deal of misery among the operatives. A committee of political scientists investigated the strike and reported on May 28 hat the entire blame must be put upo he manufacturers, who, the report ys, broke their agreement with the u ns. The manufacturers, on the other nd, claim that the lockout and conse nt strike resulted from the refusal o he union to agree to the continuati of their contract. On June 1 the n nufacturers opened their shops and in ed their employees to return at old ges and under old conditions, but the u ons were able to hold the strikers and one of the shops were able to operate.

FOSSILS IN THE PROPER PLACE. he fossil bones of a nearly complete ult male mastodon skeleton were exca ed at Minamac, Ind., in 1915 by a rty from the Smithsonian Institution. he now completed skeleton, with but tle artificial restoration, is being asse led for exhibition in the fossil verte ate hall of the new National Museum. he Kolyma River region of northern S ria has yielded a number of fossil ma nal bones, the most important find he g a finely preserved skull of the Si an mammoth, which is the only sk of this monster in any American mus m.

A VACATION FOR THE HORSE. S istics made public on June 7 by the ief statistician of the vehicle manufact ers showed that the annual output of l se-drawn vehicles had fallen off in ive years 397,569. The productio of private carriages has decreased 3.8 per cent. in number and 30 per ce in value in the five years. The outp of wagons for commercial use has decreased 9.5 per cent in number nd 13.6 per cent. in value, about one- ird of the decrease being in farm wa ns. The production of sleighs and sled has decreased 48½ per cent.

LABORS OF ATLAS COMPLETED. On June 6 it was reported from Washi on that Major General Goethals, who hdrew his request for retirement st September in order to reconque he slides in Gaillard Cut, feeling now at the slides would not again offer se us permanent difficulties, had renewe his application for retirement as an a ve officer in the army.

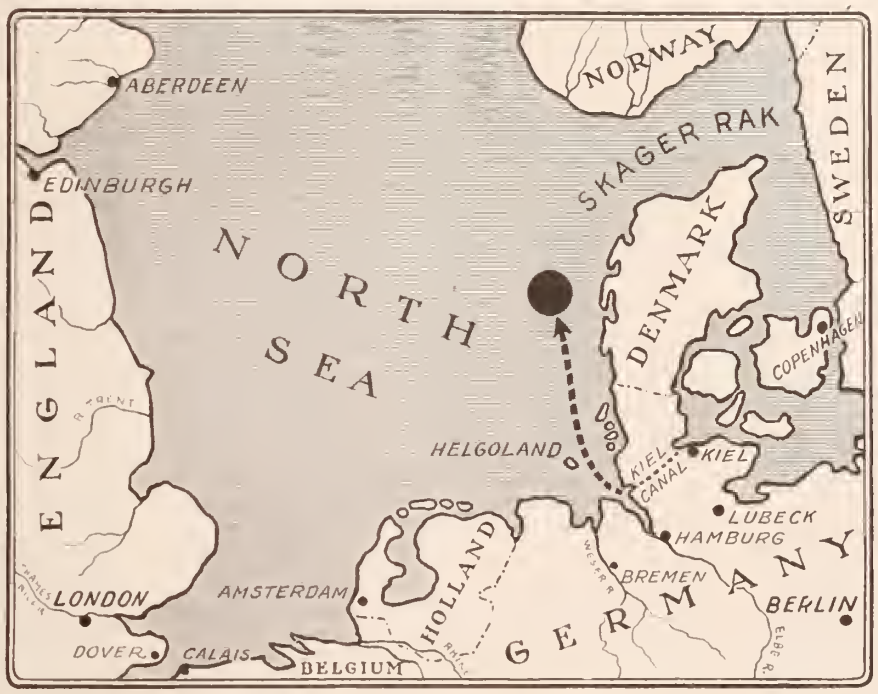
The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Independance Belge

THE Allies, toward the end of the week, June 2–9, began to apply the screws to the government of Greece to compel it to completely accede to their desires, the British government prohibiting further exports of coal to that country and refusing clearance papers to Greek ships in Welsh ports. At the same time, the French general in command at Salonica placed that city and the district occupied by the Allies' troops under martial law, thus superseding the local Greek authorities. It was further announced that the Allies were considering restrictive measures at Greek ports, looking to the prohibition of all foreign commerce, and quite open threats were made of seizing the various rich islands in the Mediterranean belonging to Greece, all of which is intended to check the growing intimacy of the Greek and Bulgarian governments, to prevent the enemy from receiving supplies through Greece, and to compel the demobilization of the Greek army. On June 8, King Constantine ordered the demobilization of one-half the Greek army.



Scene of the world's greatest naval battle

THE Allies are still making progress in German East Africa, but slowly, owing to the difficulties which the country presents to campaigning and to the enormous distances to be covered. The colony is being invaded from three directions, north, west and south, by Belgian, French and British forces, while the seacoast on the east is patrolled by the Allied navies, and completely blockaded. The German forces, shut in on all sides, are unable to be reinforced from any quarter, and consequently any losses by them are practically permanent, so that their strength must constantly diminish. This fact in itself will in the course of time make the Allies surely triumphant.

In eastern Egypt some skirmishes have been reported during the past week in the region to the northeast of the Suez Canal, but no fighting of great importance.

That the introduction of compulsory military service for married men in Great Britain, which, however, was absolutely necessary, is going to impose considerable hardships and bring about a great change in the whole life of many British women, seems to be apparent. A recent article in one of the leading British papers deals with this subject in such a calm, yet interesting, way that it seems worth quoting, particularly as it deals most largely with a phase of the subject which has not been touched on before in our press, as far as I have seen:

> That women of the middle classes will have to bear the burden of compulsion is very evident from inquiries made yesterday. Military service has introduced comparative comfort into many poor homes, but it will bring comparative poverty to many well-to-do homes. Keeping up appearances will be frankly impossible, and with prices at their present high standard, the separation allowance, even with the most generous system of grants to meet rent, mortgage interest, school fees, and so forth, will be but a drop in the ocean to women whose husbands found it difficult to meet their expenses on $2,000 to $2,500 a year. The only woman who has any opportunity of being carefree in the coming months will be the unmarried woman between 18 and 30, or the older woman whose husband does not come under the new act.

From the reports reaching us from London it would seem that the great mass of the British public had reached the conclusion that Lord Kitchener's death was the result of the activities of the German secret service in England, which had found some means of ascertaining the fact of his departure for Russia on the Hampshire. These reports further state that this feeling may result in mob attacks on the non-interned persons of Teutonic birth resident in Great Britain, on an even larger scale than the anti-German riots some months ago. A portion of the British press with the Northcliffe papers leading them is demanding the immediate internment of all such persons without regard to age or sex.

The German government in the middle of the week introduced a bill in the Reichstag providing for a further war credit of $3,000,000,000, and the German chancellor again discussed peace, saying, among other things:

"Our enemies wish to let it (the war) go on to the end. We fear neither death nor the devil, not even the hunger devil which they wish to send into our country. The men who fight out there around Verdun, who fight under Hindenburg, our proud bluejackets who showed Albion that rats bite, are fashioned from a breed that knows how to bear privations also."

To this Mr. Lloyd George responded in part as follows:

"I have never despaired of victory. The task will be hard, but the end is sure. It is Germany's military force that we must beat. A peace imposed on Germany exhausted in food and materials only would not be durable. It would be a moral defeat for the Allies. That peace we do not want. Only a crushing military victory will bring the peace for which the Allies are fighting, and of which Germany will understand the meaning. That victory we shall have; it will be complete and final."

Neither of these speeches, though they sound very unrelenting and determined, need be taken too seriously, and they will have little or no effect on the underground movements for peace which are apparently going along very smoothly.

IN the fighting on the Verdun west front on Friday, the Germans succeeded in driving the French completely out of Les Caurettes wood, to the west of Cumières, and between that village and Le Mort Homme Hill, and well to the south of its southern boundary. The French, by a desperate counter-attack, succeeded in regaining a portion of the German first-line trenches to the south of this wood, thus somewhat improving their position. The day was marked by violent artillery bombardments by the Germans of the country south of Hill 304 and the whole front from south of Le Mort Homme to the Meuse.

On Saturday and Sunday the chief fighting was transferred to the northern front, where the Germans were apparently concentrating their efforts on the capture of Fort Vaux and the French positions from that fort to Damloup. At Fort Vaux itself the Germans have

The Heart of the Gospel

*A SERMON BY REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

TEXT—Mark 16 : 15, R. V. "Preach the Gospel to the whole creation."

THE divine compassion is at once the source and stream of missionary activity and power. Of all our arrangements for carrying on this work of the Master we may say:

"Our little systems have their day:
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of thee,
And thou, O Lord, art more than they."

Methods change, the message never changes. The localized means by which we obey may vary, and ought to vary, with changing conditions and manners and men. The impulse of obedience never varies; the reason for it abides.

Now while the methods may change as I have said, we yet need to be careful how we change them. Consequently, it is well sometimes to remember that the Master has laid distinct responsibility upon his people, and, after his wonderful fashion in the midst of the declaration of principles, has revealed to us lines of procedure which we need to discover if we are to cooperate with him.

In the phase of the commission which we are considering, the thing that arrests is not limitation; it is rather its tremendous sweep: "Go ye into the whole cosmos, and herald the Gospel to all the creation." Jesus no longer said, "Go not to any save the lost sheep of the house of Israel." He no longer said: "You shall not enter into any city of the Samaritans, nor into any way of the Gentiles." All that was now changed.

The commission is broad, comprehensive, all-inclusive. If we could lift ourselves out of all the wonderful surroundings of the Christian fact of this age, and put ourselves back among the group of men who, in the upper room, received this commission, we should appreciate better the wonder of it. The Man speaking had been hated, buffeted, cast out!

It was this rejected One who stood in that upper room in Jerusalem surrounded by a group of men of whom not one counted by the arithmetic of men; not one was weighty in the balances of the world. A little group of mere nonentities. That is the world's view.

Get into the midst of that little group of men and look more closely. There stood the One who had mastered sin in every conceivable form; refused to initiate it in his own life; refused to admit it by seduction from without; and at last, having gathered it into his own personality, in the great mystery of his dying had mastered it and made it not to be.

I stand in his presence in imagination, in the quietness of that upper room, one of the little company gathered round him. What is this message? The good news; that is the most literal of all translations, perhaps the most beautiful of them all. The good message, the announcement that in itself is good. Preach that, said Jesus, to the whole earth. I want to specially emphasize this truth, that the message which we are commissioned to carry to all the earth is a message whose essential notes are those of hope, of gladness, of delight. I think, perhaps, I can best put this by saying that the true evangelist and the true missionary is hopeful, jubilant, and hilarious. We are not sent finally to men with a message of denunciation, or with a message of judgment. We are sent with the good news

"of sins forgiven,
Of hell subdued and peace with heaven."

I am not at all sure that in our missionary work at home, commonly called evangelistic work, we are not too fond, too prone to tell men that they are sinners. The vast majority of them need the message of how they can be saved from their sin.

WHO are the men to whom Jesus spoke? These men were chosen men, and I believe that our Lord's choice was not capricious, neither was it forced by circumstances. It was a choice of set purpose, and of infinite wisdom, individually made for varied need. If the men of light and leading of that nation had heard his voice, and had obeyed it, he would still have chosen Peter, and James, and John. There was an infinitude of meaning in his choice. It was no capricious calling to himself of the first strangers that passed him on the high road, but the definite selection of definite men to do definite work. And I believe also that, added to this, when you come down to the more specific work of the preacher and the missionary, the Lord is still calling definite men for definite work. Jesus chose Peter because he wanted one man at least who was fiery and impetuous, and daring and magnificent. And he chose John because he must have a man who knew how to lean his head on his own dear bosom and listen to the beating of his heart; to tell the story to the stricken world of how tender that heart is. And he chose James, for he must have one practical ethical man, who will scourge you if you dare offend the love that lies behind the ethic. And he chooses men still for definite places in the field, and for specific work, and when the call comes to a man, not merely as the fire that drives him to cooperation, but as the call that bids him to definite work, it is because he wants just what that man is able to accomplish. They were chosen men. I love to read these words, "Ye did not choose me, but I chose you . . . that ye should go and bear fruit, and that your fruit should abide." That choice was not to salvation; it was the choice to service.

But, again, they were transformed men; and by that I mean that they were men who in their own experience knew the power of the Gospel they had to preach. Christ never sends a man until the evangel has become the very music of his own life. A man may get up and face a congregation, and may tell them correctly, musically, with dramatic tenderness, that Jesus loves them, and yet accomplish nothing. The man who can tell his fellow men, bruised, broken, battered, spoiled by sin, "Jesus loves you; I know it, because he loves me. Jesus can save you; I know it, because he has saved me. Jesus can make you pure; I know it, because he has purified me"—that is the man that preaches the Gospel with power. Transformed men must be the bearers of the great evangel.

YET I am glad to have the last thing to say, for my comfort and for yours. They were frail men. Let me give you Christ's estimate of them. It is in this chapter, at the fourteenth verse, "He upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart." Those are the men he sent. I would not have sent them. Would you? But he was right in sending them. Why? Because he knew he was mightier than their unbelief, mightier than their hardness of heart; and he knew that as he had chosen them, and saved them through sifting, and transformed them already, though not perfectly, he knew that as they began to tell his evangel their unbelief would pass and perish, their hardness of heart would give place to tender compassion like his own. That which vindicated the action of Jesus in sending these men was his own majestic, royal confidence in himself; and, blessed be God, he is the same still. That is why I try to preach his Gospel. Unbelief; I know it. Hardness of heart; sometimes I am overwhelmed by it. And yet he sends me, not because I am fitted to tell his Gospel, but because I am his, and I love him; and he is able to breathe on my unbelief until it becomes faith, touching my hardness until it glows with the fervor of a great affection. Frail men, let no man stand back if the Master calls, saying, I am unequal to it. We all know that, and Jesus knows it; but he is equal to it, if we will but obey him.

And, finally, mark the method. "Go," says Jesus. That is one of the lonely words that I sometimes think it would be good for those of us who have private places of prayer to have emblazoned in gold, and hung in front of us. "Go."

Jesus never commissioned us to build churches and invite people to come into them. We are not wrong to do these things, but that is not the commission. When you have erected your own church in your own neighborhood, and have circularized the population, you have not done your duty. Go, says the Christ; that is the philosophy of evangelism. Men will not come to you; there will always be the crowd outside, who will not come. Thank God for those who come; but there is always the outside crowd. I am not merely speaking of this great city, which grows on a man until his heart nearly breaks; but of the crowds beyond, over the whole earth. Go to them; you must reach them with the evangel. It is not enough to set up centers and invite them. You must carry the evangel to them where they are. That is the whole genius of the missionary movement.

Yet notice the actual words; Go into the whole earth, and as I reminded you when I read the xt, the word is cosmos, which includes the whole inha ted earth, and all that dwell within it. Every nation ays Jesus, needs to hear this message, quite indepenc tly of any other considerations, the consideratio of civilization or of absence of civilization; the cons ration of religion, high and ethical and aspiring, of superstition, low and dark and groveling. With es we have nothing to do. The whole earth—I ne, sitting upon the seven hills; Greece, culturec nd rotten; the isles beyond. The whole earth, ar we have not fulfilled our obligation until the whole rth has heard the great evangel.

BUT, once again, mark the spaciousness it; Herald the evangel to the whole creation. his Roman letter Paul said: "We know that the ole creation"—that is the same phrase exactly—the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pai together until now"; and a little earlier in the same ragraph: "The earnest expectation of the creation aiteth for the revealing of the sons of God." We ive often heard it said that Nature is red in tootl nd claw. Express it so if you will. I prefer to-nig to remind you of the same truth in the great and st ely language of this apostle to the Gentiles. "The ole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain toget r." Say, if you will—and you are correct in so say —that man is the final thing in creation. It do not matter what is your view as to the process of crea on, whether the traditional, or the evolutionary; th act abides that man stands at the crown of all. D not forget that below him, all down through the ale of life, suffering is the result of man's sin. D not forget that you cannot degrade the king of a kin om without degrading the kingdom too. Do not f get that when man fell from his high estate of king er the lower orders of life, he dragged with him nto suffering the whole creation. I believe the whol reation will yet be redeemed. I believe that thi old earth of ours—forgive me, the earth is not old, is young—that this earth of ours will be saved, an will have its day. I believe the animals are yet to h a better chance. I believe flowers will be far more u tiful than they are today. When and how? en man himself is redeemed, he will lift with hin he whole creation.

Sometimes I travel on the train through th ty and look at the backs of the houses. I may be w ng, but I think I know where Christian people li by the state of their gardens. Sometimes I am a id there are not many Christian people in the city I take that outlook. Give me a man that is redeem by Christ, and finds the dignity of his manhood in C st, and his garden will look better. One token of s ation reaching some man or woman, struggling ba to purity, is that they will want at least a geraniu in their window. When this Gospel is preached, and n is lifted, the whole creation will be lifted too. Paul sa — and whatever dispensational value there may be it, at least there is the principle of a philosophy in — "the whole creation groaneth," waiting for w t? "For the revealing of the sons of God." Are you a ld of God? Then by your life and your tenderne to the poor and the suffering, to the animals, to al he plants, you are preaching the Gospel to the crea n.

Men went down into the coal pits after the W sh revival and began to drive their horses, and ey would not move. Why not? They had been di en with blows and cursings and brutality; and they re not used to the tenderness. Thank God, they re getting used to it. And those horses will work b er now. There are some little children terribly a id when father first comes home, saved! They do ot understand the tenderness.

This Great Commission is not two thousand rs old. This Commission is new, fresh, immed e, present. Oh that God would help me to speak in h tones of tenderness as to convince you that, un n by the eyes of sense, there is yet present here e same living Christ. He is saying to us the same th g. He waits for us. The world waits for us. All crea n waits for us. Listen, while the Babel of ea s voices is silent, listen! Young man, my brot r, young maiden, fair and beautiful and ready for e, listen! He says, Go! It is very definite. Loy y is involved! It is very urgent. Love is appealed ! It is very wise. Trust is demanded! If you will t go, tell him so, and why. And if then your consci e is clear I have no more to say.

The Invisible Forces

SUNDAY, June 25. II Kings 6 : 17. "Lord, open his eyes that he may see: And behold, the mountains were full of horses and chariots round about." It is always our peril to think that the visible field reveals all the factors in the campaign. We are bondslaves to our sight, and we are therefore its victims. We make a survey of our circumstances, and we are appalled, because the opposing forces appear overwhelming. We do not see the armies of the air, the invisible legions which fill the mountains with their horses and chariots. We leave out the hosts of the Lord!

The invisible army moves with strange quietness. It is as a wind that bloweth where it listeth. Nay, scarcely a wind; more like a breath! The army of the Lord is like an atmosphere. Its destructive ministry is as silent as the frosty air of a calm winter's night. "The grass withereth because the breath of the Lord bloweth upon it!" That is all that is needed. And that withering breath is blowing upon all the forces of iniquity. It is the certain minister of dissolution. We can no more avoid it than we can escape the air we breathe. No strategy can outmatch it. No subtlety can dislodge it. The evil doer is in God's withering breath. "Who can stand before his cold?"

On the one hand the same atmosphere can be as the breath of the spring. It is the "quickening spirit." It is the secret of mystical energy. In its gracious friendliness "the leaf shall not wither." It is the ally of the faithful, and it endows the cause of rectitude with eternal youth.

The apostle Paul had a great way of calling these invisible forces to mind. Only he did not call them forces: to him they were presences—nay the one Presence, and the breath was just the mighty Personality of the Holy Ghost. And in the blessed assurance of this great fellowship he goes along his ways, exultant, confronting the seemingly impossible. He goes to Ephesus in this alliance of the Spirit. He goes to Corinth. And he impatiently hungers to face the tremendous antagonisms in Rome herself! He craves the biggest tasks in order that he may reveal the more bountifully his resources in grace. He leagued himself with the Lord, and he knew himself to be "mighty to the pulling down of strongholds." And so shall it be with us if we ceaselessly seek the same communion, looking not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. When we go out upon a righteous way, even though our enemies are massed in fierce hostility, the mountains shall be full of invisible horses and chariots, for the Lord of Hosts shall be with us, the God of Jacob shall be our refuge.

The Joy of Union with Christ

MONDAY, June 26. Psalm 45 : 1-17. "The things which I have made touching the king." The Psalmist's heart was bubbling over, as boiling water in the caldron, or a geyser-spring rising hot from unknown depths amid arctic snows. No earthly monarch can fulfil perfectly the rapturous expressions of these noble ascriptions. They may have been suggested by the marriage of Solomon, but they pass far beyond the magnificence and significance of that event, though it symbolized the union of Hebrew and Gentile in the kingdom of God. Only the eternal reign of Jesus over the hearts of men can realize this dream.

He is fairest of the children of men. The people who heard him in the days of his flesh wondered at the gracious words which proceeded from his lips. His majesty combines with meekness, and the prosperity of his kingdom is based on truth and righteousness. "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever; a scepter of righteousness is the scepter of thy kingdom." We may carry on the parallel; for God annointed him for his earthly ministry when baptized by John in Jordan; and the unction of the Holy One was renewed when, as High Priest of humanity, he received of the Father the gift of the Holy Spirit on his ascension. It is the oil of gladness, as he said: "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."

Our Duty to Brighten the World

TUESDAY, June 27. Proverbs 4 : 18. "But the path of the righteous is as the dawning light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." We have just returned from a long walk into the country, where we ran across a little quiet town where one of the inhabitants told me the people were "settling down." One could have no doubt of it. Everything had the appearance of yesterday. It seemed as if everyone with any spirit had moved away. The houses were dilapidated, farm machinery that was no longer used was left strewn about to decay in the back yards, and even the dogs moved about with the dejected air that seemed to say: "It is all finished!" The place had gone to seed; its former light, if it ever had any, was now darkness. The town had settled down to die.

How different the picture of life given in this day's meditation by the writer of the Proverbs, the portrayal of existence that grows brighter and more resplendent as the days wear on.

I used to be gladdened to see Mr. John Bigelow growing old, and at the same time growing young, as he worked at his desk, and walked about Gramercy Park in New York, long after he was three score years and ten. I was wont to watch his bright window at night from the place where I was then living; one day I saw him when he was over eighty years of age, leaving for his accustomed trip for Europe in the summer, always seeking new scenes and fresh life adventures. He never "settled down."

Today I thought of him, as I talked with a man who was living on the shreds of his meager past.

Solomon was right. The path of the Christian should be a dawning light brightening with ever more radiant experiences. It is truly a great adventure, for it is always taking in more and more of life in the companionship of God. No Christian should be content to live on the stale narratives of other years. Each succeeding day should be more interesting than the last if we walk with the "Unseen Guest" who points out for us new beauty. Then death is not darkness, but a blending of lights.

Our Refuge, Helper and Friend

WEDNESDAY, June 28. Psalm 72 : 1-20. "For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth." The injustice of Eastern judicial tribunals is proverbial. It is so today; it has always been so. The hand of the Oriental judge has always been susceptible to gold. The poor, the needy, and they who had no helper have always fared badly. James, in his Epistle, does not scruple to say: "Ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment-seats?" Therefore the Psalmist fastens on this as the distinguishing mark of the King after God's own heart, who is to gather mankind beneath his sway, that he shall judge the poor of the people, and save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor.

The world-wide empire of our King gleams through these verses. The wild Bedouin of the deserts and the sailors on the Western seas, the kings of Sheba in the East and the kings of the isles on the West, all nations in fact, shall call him blessed, and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory. But on what does his empire rest? Napoleon's empire was founded on force, and it passed. Christ's rests on mercy, gentleness, and truth, therefore it shall last forever. "All nations shall serve him, for he shall deliver the needy when he crieth." Art thou poor and in need? Is thy soul oppressed with deceit and violence? Art thou without a helper? Then be of good cheer! The King is willing to be thy friend! Thou art the kind of subject that he seeks. Let him hear thy case; he will assuredly undertake to plead it in heaven and on earth. Be of good cheer, thou blind beggar; rise, he calleth thee, to give the sight of himself first, and then of the spiritual realm into which he shall bring thee.

The "Joys of Salvation"

THURSDAY, June 29. Psalms 51 : 12. "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with a willing spirit." Death-bed repentance and forgiveness are to be desired, of course, but the loss to the individual of the pleasures and the luxuries of a Christian, who has learned that he can trust God and not be afraid of him, is irreparable. It is well to have the shackles of sin and self-will broken off us at the grave, but it is quite another thing to feel the freedom of the son of God through the changing scenes of a long life.

Furthermore, sins of self-will leave scars. David knew well the way in which conscience pursues a man and spoils much of his joy of salvation. Jacob prevailed in his wrestling with the angel, but he left the battlefield halting on his thigh. It takes time to overcome the trace of wrong doing, for the pleasure of salvation is something acquired by habit, and habits cannot be formed over night.

The Christian life is something more than safety: it is a joy. It is not satisfactory to be barely saved: the soul wants to be glad in the divine companionship. We seem sometimes to clothe our faith with fear, rather than with love and kinship with Christ. We treat God as we would a false friend, whom we have to watch lest he go back on his promises. Joy and ease in the Christian life do not come by such method. If we have given truly our wills to him, we should cease talking about Christian duties: there should come the sense of religious privileges. We have a right now, not to the crumbs that fall from the divine table, but to the feasting, the fatted calf, the ring on our finger, and the fairest robe in our Father's house.

"Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." If my religion is a strait-jacket, let me herewith change it for an easy garment of joyfulness and peace. If we are honestly repentant, this is our rightful dress.

The Unchangeableness of God

FRIDAY, June 30. Psalm 102 : 11-28. "But Thou shalt endure." In the opening of the Epistle to the Hebrews these magnificent words are directly applied to our Lord. In the beginning, whenever that may have been, he laid the foundation of the earth, a grain at a time, through untold millenniums. The heavens are tapestries woven in the looms of eternity by the fingers that touched deaf ears and dumb tongues to health. And when all that is visible in this natural world has passed away, worn out like the clothes and fabrics of mortal life, he will continue, unchangeably the same. He will make all things new, but will not need renewal. "The same yesterday, and today, and forever!"

Sin cannot change him. We may be overcome by some sudden gust of passion or honeycombed and ruined by the insidious workings of evil, but after some terrible explosion, that may wreck the confidence of our friends and excite the derision of our foes, we shall find him absolutely unaltered, though perhaps with traces of sorrow and anxiety in his face. Periods of declension cannot change him. We do not always live in the spring with its song-birds and flowers. There are times when the frost-king holds us tight in his grasp, freezes the flow of desire, and nips the bursting of leaf and bud. But when the temperature begins to rise again, we shall detect no trace of resentment in his attitude. Time does not change him. The vesture of our body may show signs of decrepitude and decay. It may wax old and be laid aside in the bosom of mother earth. In our retrospect our days may seem like the curling smoke-column, soon dissipated in the air, but as we pass to him, we shall find him as he was when the hope of our childhood was fair as the dawn.

Giving Freedom to the Soul

SATURDAY, July 1. Rev. 21:1. "And there was no more sea." John, a prisoner on the lonely isle of Patmos, separated from all his friends, looked towards the heavenly shores and exclaimed, "There shall be no more sea"—of separation or limitation.

There are many limitations in the Christian life outside of prison walls. Are we not all prisoners of hope, struggling to become free from some unfavorable environment? There are the "shut-ins," who long for liberty to do and dare, but Christ is with them in their solitude, inspiring souls to act under restrictions. Mrs. Bella Cooke for sixty years was imprisoned in a single room by illness, but on her bed of pain she wrote three wonderful books that have been a blessing to thousands of readers. She made her little room a meeting-place where the charity of the rich and the poverty of the poor met together in beautiful harmony. There are others whose lives are limited by losses, trials and sorrows, who trust in him who is able to make adverse things work together for good. Faith in Christ will burn all barriers away, giving flight and freedom to the soul.

Often we beat our heads like birds against the bars of our cages of impassible circumstances, only at last to find the cage a blessing, for, as birds sing sweeter in cages, so the melody of the soul becomes richer when hemmed in by sorrow.

Light Up the "Dark Places"

THERE has probably never been a time of deeper heart-searching among God's people than now. They are taking a wider view of duty than before and cherishing higher spiritual ideals. Especially do they realize the imperative need of spreading the Gospel throughout the "dark places" of the earth. The momentous events that are now taking place throughout the world admonish them to make haste in the "King's business."

It should not be forgotten, however, that world-evangelization and world-conversion are wholly distinct things. The first is the duty imposed on the whole church on earth; the second is God's work and his alone. Our task, then—and there are many present evidences of its urgency—is to bend every effort and to make all needful sacrifices to bring the good news of redeeming grace to the nations and tribes still unreached.

We are thankful that, even in the midst of the general world disturbance, the church as an organization and the great body of believers as individuals are becoming fully aroused to the need and the opportunity. From many lands comes the cheering news of thousands turning from heathenism to Christianity. Missionaries in Japan, India, Korea, China, South America and the islands of the sea tell of the multitudes that are coming into the church—whole villages and populous districts at a time, their very numbers so bewildering as to impress the workers with the conviction that God is drawing the nations to himself. They hail this sign as something so far beyond their experiences in the past, that they can only marvel at it as a miracle of divine power.

Tibet and certain other Asiatic states, parts of Central Africa, a considerable portion of Central and South America, large tracts in Western China and some of the peoples of the extreme north are yet in spiritual darkness. These should be reached with the Gospel quickly. In carrying out the Great Commission, it is even more important to open up new fields than to linger in the old, although the latter should not be neglected.

Thousands of readers of this journal, who have had an active share in spreading the Gospel in heathen lands, can testify to the blessing which the work has brought into their lives. We would rejoice to have thousands more engaged in the same glorious cause. Still more would it gladden our hearts if we could be able to say, with full assurance, that the whole Christian Herald Family was actively engaged sowing the seed in these needy fields. Never was the opportunity so great, the call so urgent, as now, when the dwellers in the last of the world's dark places are waiting for the message. With a mighty effort by a united church, the proclamation could soon be completed and the great task, given two thousand years ago, gloriously fulfilled.

Will It Hinder Peace?

THE great sea-fight turns out to have been indecisive after all. It was a drawn battle, with ample prestige for both sides. Germany has not won control of the seas, although Great Britain's faith in its traditional rulership of the waves is very rudely shaken. Thousands of brave men have perished and many a famous fighting ship lies on the North Sea bottom. Admirals, captains and gallant seamen have gone down with their vessels, but the tremendous sacrifice has made no material difference in the general situation. The world, standing aghast at the encounter and its fearful results, is told that the outcome has not materially changed the ratios of sea power of the contestants. It has not altered one whit the status of the war. Germany celebrates it as a victory which disproves the invincibility of Britannia's "walls of steel," while England also claims a triumph which leaves her with a fleet still superior in numbers and capable of defending her coasts. The losses in the great war have been so enormous that the fate of the men who died in the fight off Skagerrack has elicited only a passing expression of sorrow and regret, and a brief encomium of their patriotism and valor. In the midst of a war which demands vast and incessant sacrifice there is little time for mourning.

It has been suggested that the Jutland sea-fight will prove an impediment to peace, as it will kindle anew the desire for a strong war policy, and create a prejudice against all peace talk. While the momentary furor lasts, this will doubtless be so; but when it passes, and the full realization comes that the battle was not decisive, there is little doubt that peace will again occupy the minds of the peoples of the European nations. Every great event emphasizes the folly of continuing this struggle and adding to the horror and hopelessness. Thus Skagerrack may prove, after all, an early gateway to peace.

One of the leading English journals, the Nation, sounds a note which may be regarded as representing the drift of public opinion in that country. In a strong plea for acceptance of American mediation the Nation says: "Here is a great friendly country, able to determine the issue which has us by the throat, . . . which now, in the person of her President, offers to associate herself with an international settlement that Sir Edward Grey has defined as the one thing he wishes to get out of the war. Yet we treat this advice as an unwarrantable intrusion on our blissful enterprise. . . . How could this but confirm the impression which more than one American has carried away from our shores—that we are the real obstacle to peace? I am sure the government does not think in this fashion about the President's tender. I do not think the British public think so either." In the British Parliament lately, a Scottish member, Mr. Ponsonby, argued that the time had come for the government to make peace terms. He pointed out that the war had reached a deadlock and the government should recognize this and not imperil the situation by delay. Recriminations should cease. The war would never end if diplomatic etiquette were permitted to stand in the way of taking the lead definitely in bringing the nations back to sanity and peace.

When peace comes, it will come immediately after some great crucial event. Let us be patient and ready for its coming. It is always the darkest hour before the dawn.

Overdoing a Good Thing

THERE is a vast amount of sham professionalism in the world. How the souls of Carlyle and good old Walt Whitman, alike in their cordial detestation of humbugs of every description, would have rejoiced to listen to the good-humored satire with which the venerable Archdeacon Stuck of Alaska paid his compliments to the class who follow the profession of clamping up science with human sympathy and get a good living at it! Right in the middle of a baccalaureate sermon to Columbia University graduates, the old archdeacon let loose a bunch of sentences, in undiluted Yukonese, which will be appreciated not only in New York but in every big city where professional reformers, research investigators, sociologists, uplifters and philanthropists find their greatest harvest. "I have always held a dread of trained sociologists," he said, "and of anthropologists with a turn for practical benevolence; of political economists, of psychological pedagogues, and graduates in similar subjects. With their experimental laboratories, their card indexes and filing cabinets, their tabulations of statistics, their reduction of people to categories; with that last glorious achievement of theirs, the plotting of a curve, they are always in danger of evacuating the human personal element out of their work and thinking of men and women in algebraic formulæ. Some of them lay tribes and races as ruthlessly under the tyranny of curves as the medieval Popes laid the natives of Christendom under interdicts." The sole essential fact of value in the work of any public benefactor, be he philanthropist, economist, reformer or research worker, is the attitude of genuine human sympathy and its actual results. You can't make a heart throb with feeling over statistics. And you can easily systematize and tabulate a really humane project so that all the worth it ever possessed shrivels up, and all the kindness and helpfulness and Christlike spirit of it have turned to dust and ashes.

Two Strong Men Dead

IT is a difficult matter for a Christian paper to express itself accurately and adequately on the occasion of the death of a great soldier. For a great soldier is of necessity a great killer, and Christianity does not believe in killing. We join heartily in praise of the great British field marshal's courage, his industry, his thoroughness, his genius for organization and achievement. But when we reflect that these high gifts and traits were dedicated to the work of slaughtering his fellow men the words of praise falter upon our tongue. Lord Kitchener had no delusions about military organization and military work. "Our Indian military administration," he declared on taking up his work in that country, "has been framed mainly to meet peace requirements and the consideration that an army exists for war has been overlooked." It is particularly distressing to remember that the battle, if battle it can be called, which gave him his first high fame was waged against a horde of religionists, a sect of Mohammedans looking for a Messiah who should inaugurate a reign o uth and justice on earth. The feeble sword of these atic Messiah-worshipers was met by the strong sw d of Kitchener, and on one day eleven thousand o hem were slain, sixteen thousand wounded and fou ousand taken captive, while the British forces s ered the loss of not more than five hundred me

For mere bigness, however, his task of creat g a army of five million soldiers out of England's ize population is the greatest achievement of h lif One can admire the genius of a man who co l d that while bewailing the conditions and idea of civilization which made such a task appear cessary. Kitchener will go down to history as one th strongest men in a sad and dark age, when st gt was measured by the results of battle.

As for Yuan Shi Kai, whose death was ann ced to the world on the same day as that of Lord tchener, it is even more difficult to appraise the alue of his life to the world. The Chinese themselv and experts in Chinese affairs differ widely in the estimate of him. Some acclaim him the real crea r of Chinese liberty, the true founder of a real re bli others condemn him as an unscrupulous, treacl ous murderous self-seeker. He was at least wise oug to postpone his coronation as emperor when so an sections of what was to be his empire were dete ine not to surrender the republic. But whether g d or bad, Yuan was strong, and, dying as he does hil the republic still holds, there is hope that the publican form of government will persist and tri ph. His name, then, will go down to history as t t of China's first president. He will be remember and praised for his openmindedness toward all rel ons including a warm toleration of Christianity, a for his zeal for the unification and protection of ina.

"How are the mighty fallen!" In the cold rth waters, not far from the spot where, a few da before, seven thousand gallant British sailors gav heir lives for the empire, the great British War Lo lies impotent, silent, lost. In the weird palace at P ing, the scene of so much plotting, fearing, striving, amming, Yuan Shi Kai lies dead.

The new age beckons, the age of peace and b herhood. The strong men of the new age will spen hea strength not in strife, but in peace; not for ath but for life. They will build together a civil tion founded not upon bloodshed but upon love.

An Iniquitous Bill

THE newspapers have been strangely silent ou an amazing bill just passed by the Ho e of Representatives which, if ratified by the nate and approved by the President, will disfra hise something like 165,000 citizens of the United tes. For the past fourteen years, Porto Rico ha been United States territory, and its male citizens ters under the United States government. The p sen bill, pushed quietly through the House of Repre ntatives, provides "that no person shall be allo l to register as a voter to vote in Porto Rico who not a citizen of the United States over twenty-on ears of age, and who is not able to read or write, or o is not a bona fide taxpayer in his own name in an a unt of not less than three dollars per annum."

Luis Muñoz Rivera, Commissioner from orto Rico at Washington, is emphatic in his denun tion of the bill. He declares:

> By means of this restriction, 165,000 citizens of Por Rico who vote at present, and have voted since the Spanis days, are to be barred from the polls. There is no reason th ustifies this franchise restriction. Since civil governme was established in Porto Rico sixteen years ago, eight gene elections have been held. Eight times the people of Port Rico, with a most ample suffrage law, have elected their leg ative bodies, their municipal councils, their municipal boa and their school boards. These various bodies have coo ated in the betterment and progress of the country, whic gives evidence that they were prudently chosen.

The most serious point of the new law is that hich insists upon a property qualification for the ter. This goes straight against the forward move t of our nation toward complete democracy. The ple of the whole nation should insist upon k ving what sinister influences have been engaged i this effort to deprive their fellow citizens on the isl d of Porto Rico of their right to vote, while all who lieve in real democracy must hope that the Sena will quash the present iniquitous bill or that if it is ssed by the upper House the President will promptly o it.

"Excessive partiality for one foreign natio and excessive dislike for another, cause those om they actuate to see danger only on one si ."—George Washington.

Romance of Civil War

MISS ELVIRA MOREHOUSE of Winsted, Conn., was engaged to be married to an intelligent, upright, Christian you g man. The Civil War broke out an he enlisted in the Union army. Th lay had been set, and her wedding go made. They agreed that when the ar was over he would come back to l and they would both be supremely ha y. He never came back. She ne married. She preferred the emory and spirit of her firs love to the attentions of any iving man. For fifty-five yea her wedding gown hung in r wardrobe till the other da when at her dying request she vas robed in it for her bu l. We cannot withhold an lmiration of the heroism of er love. In these days wh so many marriage con ra s are made for mere m cenary considerations, wh the contracting parties o it little more binding tha taking goods on trial, wh marriages are entered nt like time notes for thirty, six , ninety days or even a ye from date, it is beautiful to e the constancy of the aff ion of the woman who let the wedding garment hang in rn from youth to old age in emory of her first love. Th constancy of this woman's aff ion verifies this statement: "For love is strong as de ." (Song of Solomon

Habit in Fire Horses

TWO horses formerly used in the fire department, tra ferred recently to service in e street-cleaning departm of Dayton, Ohio, heard the fire alarm the other day, ra away with the ash cart, an crashing into another wa n, smashed it and broke th driver's leg. They were sp idid, royal horses, and kn that that bell meant a fir and thought it was calling th to hasten to it. If the po r of habit is so great in a ho e, how much greater is it in a n! What necessity there is forming only good habits of thought, sentiment and ac n! Any member of the bo can be trained by habit, an faculties of the mind also ar taught habits of thought an action. The great truth is here sh n: "Whatsoever a man soweth, th shall he also reap." (Gal. 6:7.)

Dylight Turned to Darkness

T nine o'clock in the morning of May 27 the city of Cleveland, O , was suddenly turned into the d ness of midnight. All business was at standstill and the gas and electric lig s had to be turned on before it c d continue. The darkness was ca ed by black clouds so heavy laden wi rain that they shut out the light. T y emptied their floods upon the city t efresh it, and let the daylight come in gain. Most of the clouds that bring d ness to life's day are laden with sl vers to purify the atmosphere and re sh the heart and promote its growth. T blackest cloud of sorrow that ever s led over this planet was full of the sl vers of salvation for the race. N ure thus shared the agony of her L d in turning suddenly from daylight to the blackness of midnight: "Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour." (Matt. 27:45.)

Shakespeare's Christianity

TWO hundred members of the Actors' Club Alliance attended a special religious service and Shakespearian celebration in the St. Thomas Episcopal Church on a recent Sunday afternoon. Frederick Warde said, among other things, "Shakespeare was an actor, a poet, and a writer of plays. I doubt if there ever will be a greater apostle of Christianity than he a writer of practical sound Christianity who still lives and will continue to live. The words 'Christ' and 'God' appear no less than 820 times in Shakespearian works. In my opinion he lived and died a Protestant Christian." It has been said that if the Bible were to be lost most of it could be gathered together again from the best literature of the world. Shakespeare and other great authors could justly say: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." (Ps. 119:105.)

Bad Eggs Were Destroyed

THERE was a bonfire in the capital of the nation the other day, not over any action of Congress, nor event of general good fortune, but caused by the condemnation and destruction of bad eggs which had been illegally offered for sale in the open market. It required fifty gallons of k rosene and five hours of time for two deputy United States marshals to cremate the 89,280 eggs condemned by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia as being unfit for use. These eggs were seized in the municipal market, where they had been offered for sale, bakeries being the usual purchasers of the canned product. The flames caused a lively bombardment, the crated eggs popping and the cans exploding from the heat. The vast amount of stale meat, fish, fowl, eggs and milk pushed into the market, and the untold damage it did to the health and life of consumers have led about every state to adopt pure-food laws, some of them with very severe penalties, and some of which are strictly enforced. The poultry industry until within the past generation was not considered very important, but has pushed to the forefront so that with the live stock and the eggs it amounts to nearly a billion dollars a year, about as much as the hay, wheat or cotton crop. The frauds in the poultry trade have been many. In one city twelve merchants, some of them wealthy, were sent to the penitentiary for selling stale poultry and eggs. It is revolting to think that a reputable baker who pretends to handle the dainty and delicious things that come out of the oven would make use of bad eggs in their baking as some of them do. It is to be hoped that th bonfire in Washington will attract the notice and stir the conscience of the whole country to the necessity of clean, square dealing in business, and the sale of pure, wholesome food instead of filthy stuff which is real poison. "If he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion?" (Luke 11:12.)

Ancient Craft in Service

A REMARKABLE example of the straits to which present shipping has been reduced for want of vessels is related in a dispatch to Copenhagen, Denmark, from Svendborg, which mentions the fact that two sailing vessels, one the Marie of Troense, which was built in 1776, and the Trends Brodre of Marstal, built in 1786, have been rigged up and sent out to enter the competition for the enormous freight rates that now are being offered everywhere. It is all wrong to drag these old hulks, one 140 years old, the other 130 years old, and risk freight and men on them to the perils of the deep. It is the "almighty dollar" back of it that is thus reckless of property and precious life. Committees of inspection should be more diligent, and accountability for damage should be well understood. Wrong as it is to put freight and men on these ancient vessels, it is worse to start the soul out on the voyage of life to do business in an unseaworthy craft. Faith is the ship that stands the storms and makes the port of safety. This great truth is here taught: "Holding faith, and a good conscience, which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck." (I Tim. 1:19.)

Reclaiming a Huge Swamp

CONSTRUCTION work has begun on the draining project in Nahunta Swamp in Wayne County, North Carolina. Contractors from Chicago and St. Louis have met with the commissioners of that district, the bonds have been delivered to the purchasers, and the money has been deposited in the local banks for completing the project. The big floating dredge has begun the excavation of dirt, the canal is completed for about half a mile. It will take eighteen months to complete the work in Nahunta Swamp to Contentnea Creek, in Greene County. The drainage scheme will reclaim 6,500 acres of the most fertile land in Wayne County. What wonderful progress science has made in taking the wet, worthless districts on farms and turning them into their most fertile sections! A good deal of drainage is needed in the mental and moral realm to change the sobby, worthless places into fruitful fields. North Carolina has used a great deal of moral drain-tiling. It has turned the whole state by popular vote from wet into dry territory. The influence of the Gospel on the individual heart and on society is thus typified by the reclamation of waste ground: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." (Isa. 35:1.)

Huge Strawberry Crop

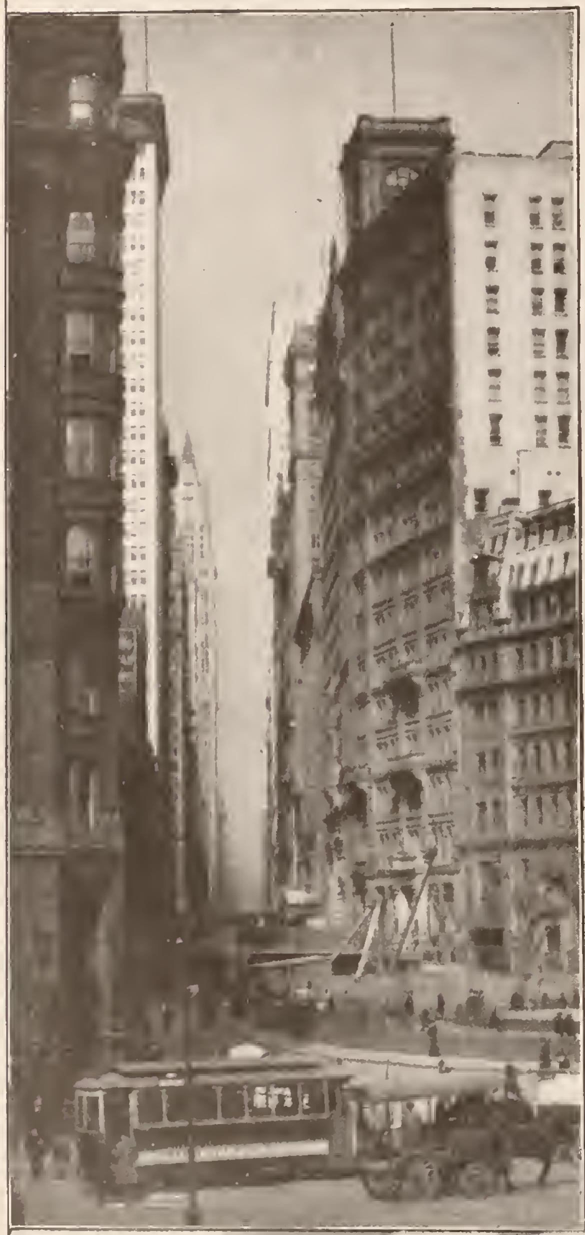
THIS year's strawberry crop will be worth $20,000,000 to the growers, exceeding all previous records, it is estimated in a summary of the crop's condition just published by the educational department of one of the leading banking institutions of the country. The crop will contain some 300,000,000 quarts. The value of the 1909 crop was estimated at $18,000,000. Maryland held the lead as producing state in that year, but since then Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana have passed her. The total fruit production of the country amounts to about $250,000,000 annually. The science of farming has made great progress in the cultivation of all kinds of fruits. It has not been many years ago since the regular farmer did not think it worth while to fool away his time with garden stuff, orchards or small fruits, except to raise what was needed for himself. Now fruit-raising is counted an important branch of farming. It is astonishing to know how much money can be made per acre on small fruits carefully cultivated. Plenty of hard work and risk of weather, but in the long run there is ample reward for this form of toil. The song of Moses giving thanks included "And for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun." (Deut. 33:14.)

Japanese Boy Inventor

NARIKATSU HAIDA, a thirteen-year-old son of a Japanese doctor in Honolulu, is a remarkable electrician for his age. He is now working on a new invention for fire alarm, which is a wireless system operated by the heat of the fire. He has also invented an electrical bicycle and has applied for a United States patent. At the age of six he was repairing watches and electric bells, and at eight he began to study electricity scientifically. The Japanese are often called the Yankees of the East. They are so bright intellectually, and so full of ingenuity. God, who is Infinite Wisdom, has endowed his children, young and old, with their immortal capabilities. Of the Son of the carpenter of Nazareth it was said: "And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers." (Luke 2:47.)

Getting About New York

NEW YORK CITY has 3,542 miles of streets, and 1,730 miles of surface, elevated and subway railroad tracks. Besides the 2,300,000 of population on Manhattan Island, the adjacent boroughs and suburban towns pour a daily contingent of hundreds of thousands more on business, pleasure, or shopping bent. From all parts of the country and the world other thousands are brought into the city to spend a day or a year, as the case may be. There is no hour in the day or night that these miles of streets and railroads are empty of human beings. For eighteen of every twenty-four hours the city is alive with travel. The traffic problem is never wholly solved, though experts are gaining on the continually increasing demands. The casual visitor will derive an immense amount of interest from spending some of his time on one or another of the various kinds of conveyances at his disposal, mostly at five cents for a ride.



THE picture at the right shows a horse car that has wandered across the old East Side and has gotten into New Chambers Street, headed west to pass under the Third Avenue elevated structure, which can be seen, and if you were in it you would get a good view of the new Municipal Building just ahead. City Hall Park lies to the left of the building as it shows in the picture. As is apparent, you would also see the washing of some of our families hanging in the sun. Probably you would also espy more than one such burden-bearer as is shown in the lower right-hand corner.

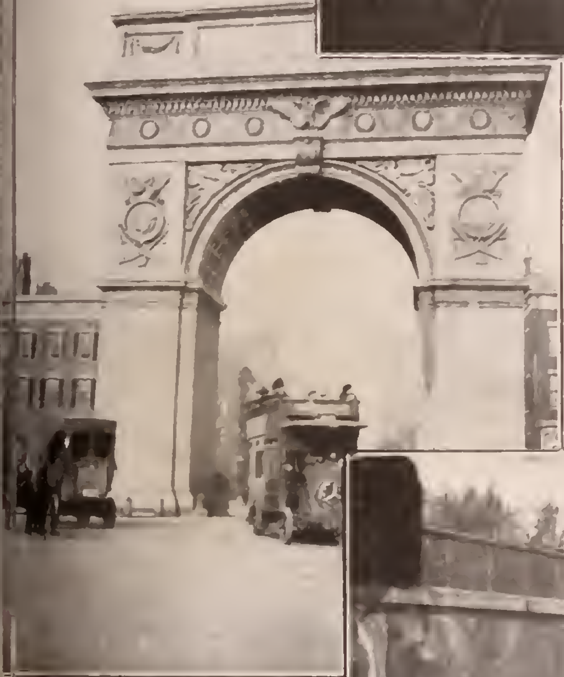
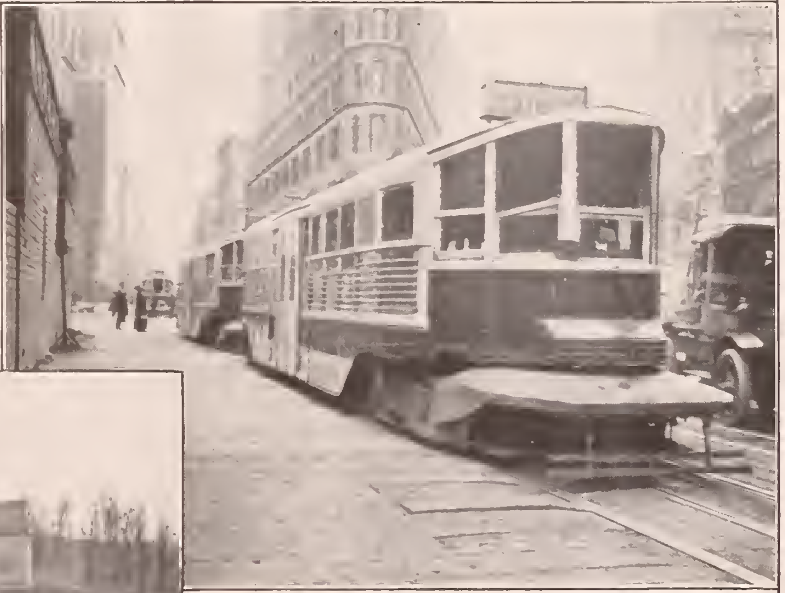
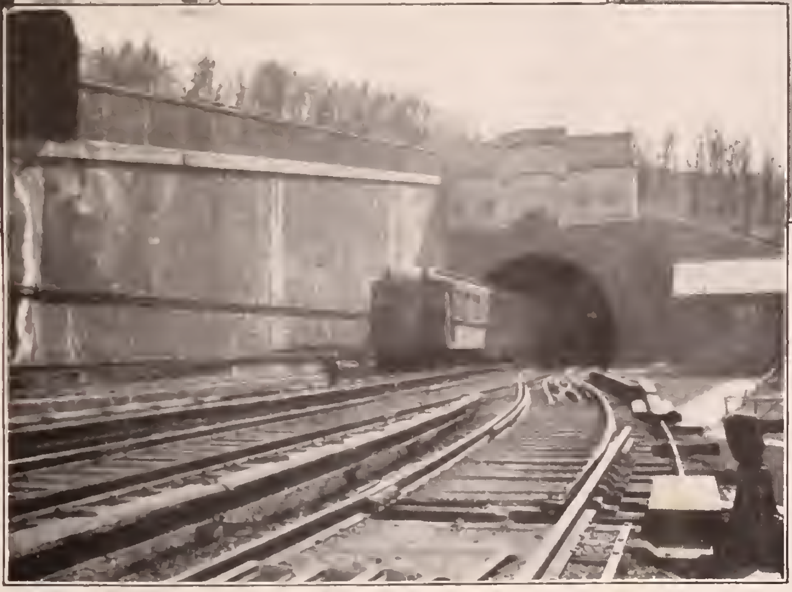
Looking down as from an aeroplane, you see below a double-decker Fifth Avenue motor bus going south through Washington Arch into Washington Square.



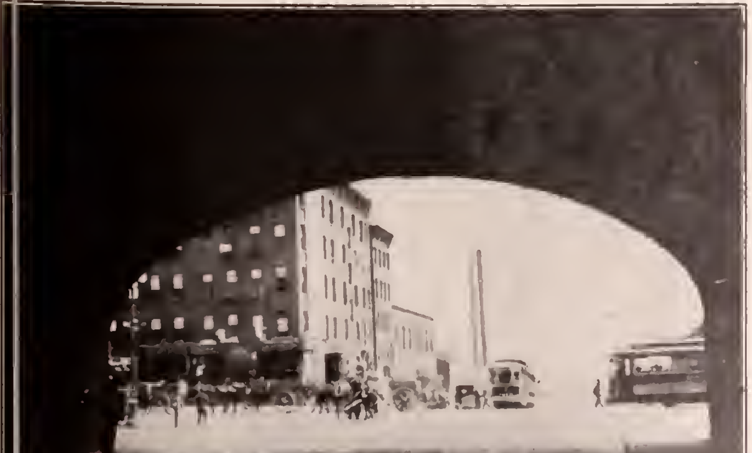
Just below you see two of the Broadway torpedo cars, the new side-door car which is becoming very popular, going north. They have just passed the Flatiron Building. Excavation is going on underneath for the new subway. When you enter these side doors, you face the conductor sitting in a cage and deposit your fare in a box, then pass to either part of the car to a seat, which, ten chances to one, you will find occupied.



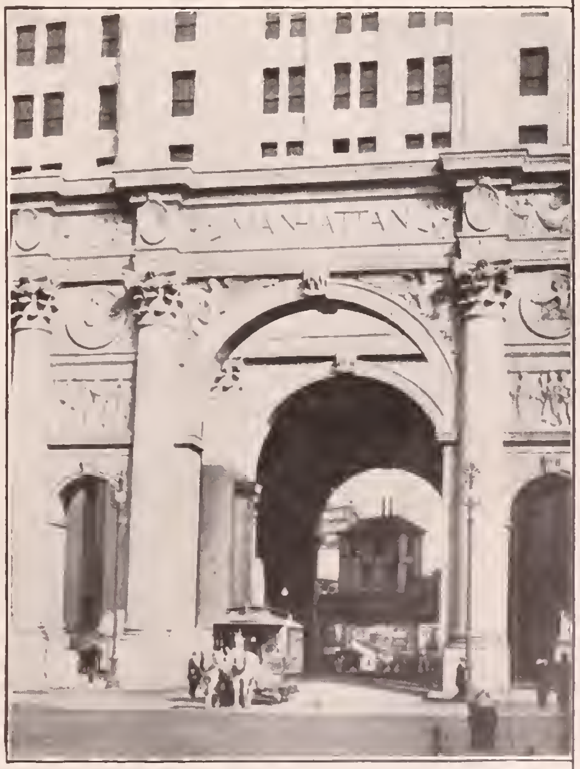
The picture below is proof positive that the subway of New York is not all sub-surface, for here is a subway train emerging from the tunnel way up in the 190's, and if you take an excursion by way of the subway, you will see some very pretty sights at those intervals where the cars are out in the open air. This train is just about to draw into the Dyckman Street station.



There are a good many charming little vistas like the one in the lower left-hand corner. Through this arch of the elevated roadbed of the New York Central, you get a glimpse of the East River and of a north-and-south, and an east-and-west car. The cross streets themselves often form mammoth loopholes, as it were, through which from the elevated trains you catch many a glimpse of the beautiful Hudson as you rattlety-bang along.



The new and the old. The horsecar and the new Municipal Building. The old leisurely mode of travel and an enormous office building with a street cut right through it. A glimpse of the elevated structure beyond.



NEW YORK CITY is really full of wonder spots of which these flying glimpses, photographed by Charles Phelps Cushing, are fair examples. There are modes of travel about the city a-plenty, and, furnished with a good guide map, an untroubled mind, a stock of good nature, and a reasonable amount of carfare, a visitor to New York will have at his command as wide and interesting a variety of "points of interest" as can be found in any city of the world.

O.K.'d by the Nation

Exacting, appreciative, practical hard-headed America—has, as one unit, O.K.'d the small, light, economical, $615 Overland.

They like its style; its good-looking lines; that smart, individual air of exclusiveness.

They like its power and pep. It shoots up a hill like a streak of greased lightning. It gives, but seldom gets, the dust.

Put five in (there's lots of room), give her a little gas and away she flies —free from vibration, rattle, stress or strain.

What do you suppose appeals to the more elderly people? Just the solid comfort. This car, unlike most of the smaller and popular priced makes, has none of that stiffness or rigidness about it. Deep, soft, divan upholstery and shock-absorbing cantilever springs take all the stiffness out and put all the comfort in.

Large tires (4-inch) also add materially to the riding qualities of the car. Also, and just as important, they help keep upkeep at a minimum.

Another thing to remember. This car comes complete. No expensive starter or speedometer or anything extra to buy.

It's the little conveniences that seem to have the broadest appeal. The electric control buttons on the steering column, convenient foot pedals and shifting levers bring everything within everyone's reach—even the price.

It is but $615—complete.

Letters of Two Thousand Years Ago

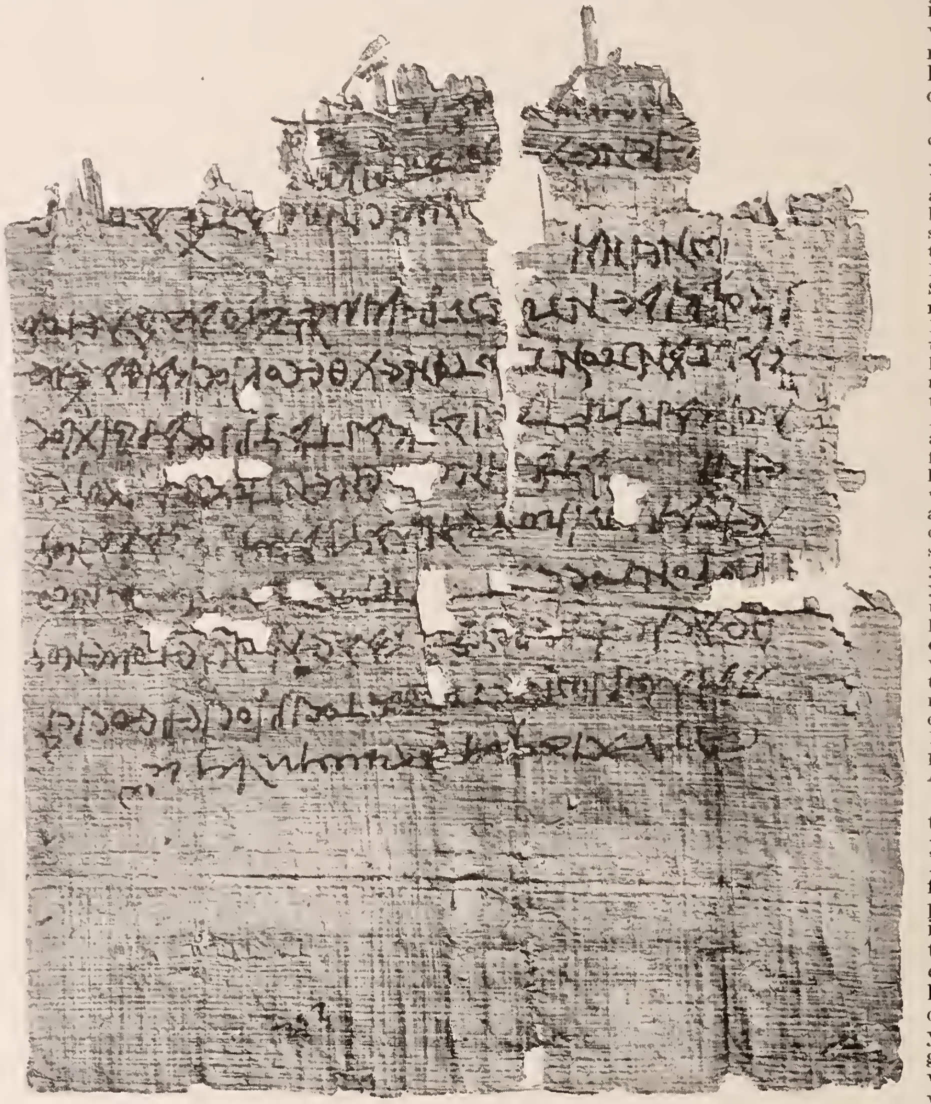
By O. H. PANNKOKE

THE military splendor of Rome has fascinated young and old for centuries. Wherever one touches later ancient civilization there are found the evidences of the presence of the Roman legions. They are in Gaul, in England, in Germany. They are in every country around the Mediterranean basin. They are in the East, in the heart of Asia. The courier-system for the despatch of letters and messages was in their hands. The legions were the vanguard to make the newly acquired territories habitable and productive. Their stationary camps became the trading centers of the communities from which the adventurous merchants pushed onward to spread with their wares Roman thoughts and Roman habits and respect for the Roman sway. When the veterans completed their years of service they were colonized and continued in their retirement to carry on the labors which formed the greater portion of their active service.

The Roman army was human. Its soldiers were men, some good, some bad, some humorous, some serious, some lovable, some despicable, but all of them eminently human. The papyrus excavations of the past hundred years have given us a glimpse into the heart and soul of the Roman soldier. It is a strange story that reads more like a romance than cold fact, how the most intimate thoughts and emotions of two thousand and more years ago lay buried in the rubbish of ancient cities to come to light in our day. Papyrus was the writing material of ancient Egypt, used in official and private correspondence, in business transactions, in legal actions. When it had served its purpose it was thrown away. Much of it also was used to wind the embalmed bodies of the dead. Fragments of it passed westward in the early part of last century without attracting much attention. The scholars of those days were interested in classical lore and literary remains, and could not foresee the infinite possibilities for studying the life of a past age from its private correspondence.

Within the last decades, however, interest changed completely. Exploration parties were sent out to go over every inch of ground and gather the remains. A host of scholars set themselves the task of deciphering and interpreting the documents. But still an immense amount of material is stored away in Oxford, the British Museum, Berlin, Paris, and other places.

Every side and interest of life in those days receives new light from these papyri. In one a prodigal son writes his mother after years of waywardness, asking for forgiveness. A schoolboy in awkward, crude hand transcribes the first verses of Paul's letter to the Romans as a school exercise. A man describes a journey up the Nile around the time of Christ and tells how he wrote the names of his friends on temple walls. Laborers complain that their pay is too low and the hours too long. Two thieves plan to have a good time clipping gold from coins and selling it. A father-in-law writes his son-in-law how to take care of a newly arrived baby, perhaps the firstborn. A workman from Alexandria writes his wife that if the child is a boy she is to keep it, if not, to do away with it. An athlete receives honorary membership in an athletic society. Of documents dealing with military organization and duty there are no end. Of letters dealing with the social and personal side of life there are comparatively few. In all the collection of documents published, I was able to find no more than about thirty of this character.



This census return, A.D. 20, is a good example of the condition of these ancient documents

In the first group, there are three letters from recruits, young men who had passed the military examination and were taken from simple home surroundings to the cosmopolitan Roman army. The first is a letter from a youth in Alexandria to his mother. He writes:

> Send me two hundred drachmæ. I have nothing any more. When brother Gemellus came I still had four hundred drachmæ. They are all gone. I bought a team of mules. Send the monthly allowance soon. When I was with you you promised to send my brother before I came to the garrison. But you sent nothing. You left me go as I stood, nothing in the pocket. Also my father on his visit gave me not a penny. All laugh at me and say: "Your father is a soldier himself, and still he sends you nothing." My father tells me when he gets home he will send me everything. But you sent nothing. Why? There is the mother of Valerius; she sent him a pair of abdominal bandages and a cruse of oil, a basket of meats and two hundred drachmæ. Send quickly. I already went and borrowed from a comrade. Also brother Gemellus sent me a pair of trousers.

Another letter similar to this served. It is from a recruit at andria to his folks. He says t has been alloted to the "cattl and was not able to get free; hopes to relieve the severity service and wants the necessary tance to that end from home. H perhaps, just gotten acquainted a number of other recruits and initiated him into a soldier's li made him realize that its success d on a well-filled purse. So in hi letter home he gently hints wh other writer broadly demanded.

The third letter is from Mis on the Bay of Naples, to Philad in Egypt. written by a recruit Api his father F chus. It read

> Apion to chus his fathe joy. Above wish you good and in all stre be happy. wi sister and her ter and her b I thank th Serapis that h me immediatel I was in dan the sea. Wh landed at Mis received from three gold And I am w ask you now, father, write letter first abou well-being: se about the wel of my broth sister; thirdly, your hand b you have brou up well. there hope to a quickly, the g voring. Greet tona very mu my brothers a enilla and my f I have sent picture. My n Antonius Ma

This lette trays a s young fel Healthy am filial devot piety, stand in every line tribute to th ents and the life from whi came. How young men gone out int world just way—their loving par wishing them

The next of letters deals with the soldier's An interesting collection of letter been preserved dealing with the at Dionysias around 340 A.D. of them are written to Abinæus prefect of the camp, and deal with phase of camplife. The first is a to Kaor, bishop of Hermopolis, half of a deserter. It reads thus:

> To my lord and brother Abinæus bishop of Hermopolis, greeting. I salu children much. I would have thee lord, concerning Paul the soldier, conc his flight. Pardon him this once, seein I am without leisure to come unto t present. And if he lied not, he will come into thy hands another time. Farew pray, my lord brother.

Here we have a companion lett Paul's missive to Philemon. Alth not as full and complete as its famous predecessor, it is pervade that selfsame interest in hum which shrinks not from helping the lowly. As Onesimus, so this des fell into the hands of a Christian, by him was convinced of his w and persuaded to return.

The next letter is from a little cated Jewish mother pleading to her on dismissed before his service was over. The letter is crude in compos on and the writing very awkward. It y be that she was in poor circum ances and needed his help. The lett follows:

> T mother of Moses to my lord patron, the pref . You have sent after Heron, lord patron He went away now after the barbarian. Exc God, we have no help. I have sent you w Athiœis, my lord. I grasp your feet, lord tron, since you know also that the five day re the whole year. I beg you and entrea ou that you grant him the few days. Wha you command tell Athiœis.

"xcept God, we have no help!" Ho the phrase stands out from the rest f the letter! Yet it was only a littl matter, the five remaining days of h son's service.

T following three letters show us the ugher side of soldiers' life, their bra s and marauding and lawlessness. Dei trios, a tax-collector, complains abo a certain Athenodorus:

> T ny lord and patron Abinæus, Demetrios, assis nt to Ision, many greetings I want you to k w, lord my patron, when I was gathering t corn in Ibion a certain soldier, Athenodoru approached me saying he was under you, d maltreated me very much; not only me, t he went out drunk and pillaged the villa . I have written you knowing that you will te him before you in the camp and give e justice. For I intended first to go to t city and bring the matter before the high commander.

T next letter is on a similar occurrenc only the writer is much more wro ht up about the matter:

> T Flavius Abinæus, prefect of the camp at Dioi sias, from Aurelius Abul. My sheep were killed, ten in number, by some evildoer and when I looked after the theft of the eep, I heard that one of your soldiers, Pau was the worst of all, worse than Peter and s brother Melas, the soldier, and Apion, son Horion, the preserver of the peace of the ne village. I pray your humanity to ook to the matter.

Vs it a band of youths gone into vil ays? It seems so. One of them s t son of "the preserver of the peace of village." It is a bit of tragic hist y of a son gone wrong in spite of goo training and parental love.

T next letter gives a delicious glin se of life and troubles in a small garr on city. Chæremon, a member of the cal council, complains to Abinæus mos vehemently against an interfere e with their jurisdiction:

> Y r conduct is not well in taking them awa You know what happened in the village For that the house of Atra was robbed and uisances committed and cattle driven off, d you made no investigation, but took ther away by force without law. By the god either you send them back that we may judge on what they did, or all the council will brin the matter before our lord the duke. If y know what's good for you, do it.

A wanton band of soldiers out for a goo time. Not especially loved by civi ns. A growing tension as the day wears long between both parties. Finally a threatening word and they are fighting. Reinforcements arrive. The villagers, who, being in the majority, were holding their own, see their prey carried away by superior force. The village council meets, and before the heated feelings are cooled off, decides to prosecute the soldiers. They get up posthaste a letter, filled with threats, to the prefect. After the letter was sent they went home, talked it over with their wives and neighbors, slept over it, and the next day, most likely, let the whole matter drop as a bad business. Possibly they fought it out.

THE so-called "Gemellus letters" are most interesting. They form the correspondence between Gemellus, an old veteran of seventy winters, with members of his family. He is still the head of the family and manages affairs. The other members farm the various pieces of property under his supervision. He writes to his son Sabinus:

> Lucius Bellenus Gemellus to his son Sabinus, greeting. Annes the donkey-driver has bought a rotten bundle of hay at twelve drachmæ—a little bundle and rotten hay, the whole of it decayed.

In another letter, his own son gets a good scolding for negligence:

> Gemellus to his son Epagathus. I blame you greatly for the loss of two pigs owing to the fatigue of the journey, when you had in the village ten animals fit to work. Heraclides the donkey-driver shifted the blame from himself, saying that you had told him to drive the animals on foot.

Another of his letters shows the firm grasp he has on every detail of his extended estates. It is to the same Epagathus:

> Lucius Bellenus Gemellus to his own son Epagathus, greeting. Please carry forward the digging of the olive yards and their plowing up and hoeing and plow up and hoe the fallows and urge the driver to do his proper work every day. Up to today you have not harvested the field at Apios, but have neglected it, and so far have harvested only the half. Do not neglect these instructions.

Finally, and above all, the old gentleman is a good father and grandfather. He enjoys family gatherings at festivals and birthdays, and is ever solicitous to make them happy by good cheer for the body and pleasant little surprises to the birthday child. He writes: "Buy us two pigs of a litter to keep at the house, for we intend to sacrifice pigs on the birthday feast of Sabinus." Then again: "Send the cocks from the market for the Saturnalia, and for Gemella's birthday feast send some delicacies." Gemella was his daughter.

That was, indeed, a happy close for a soldier's career, to be in the midst of his children, honored by the community, respected by the officials and to divide his time between honest work and the enjoyments of a useful life.

World Overturners

By Arthur H. Howland

F R the last four years we have all been used to seeing the name of the Macedonian town Salonica in the ewspapers. It was prominent in bot the Balkan wars and a little later ach ved a sad distinction when the kin King George of Greece was assas ated there. During the present wa t has been the scene of exciting oc rences as the tides of battle have fre ently swept almost to its gates. Th reeks themselves, I am told, still call Thessalonica just as they did on the lay Paul arrived there from his jou ey through Amphipolis and Apollon after he had left Philippi.

A Thessalonica Paul followed his acc tomed plan and visited the Jewish syn ogue, where he delivered his mess ag that Jesus was the Messiah. For thr Sabbaths he "reasoned with them out f the Scriptures." The third verse of our chapter is one of those big verses which can be divided into a dozen beautiful and important lessons, like a great crystal.

Notice that word "opening." That is the thing we are to do with Christian truth and Scripture doctrine—open them. There is nothing hidden, secret, esoteric about Christianity. That was the mistake the church was making in the Middle Ages, trying to keep the Bible away from the common people. That was Luther's great gift to the world, giving all people the right and the opportunity of the open Bible. The voice of Christianity is the voice of Jehovah: "Come now and let us reason together." The attitude the Christian worker must take in any age toward Jew or Gentile, moralist or sinner, young or old, is the same frank, open invitation—"Come now, let us think this thing through, let us talk it out, let us be frank and fearless, let us see what the Bible, your own heart and conscience, your own mind will say."

Times To Be Careful

In Our War Against Germs
There's No Room for Half Measures

Whatever you apply to broken skin, be sure that it's utterly sterile.

Germs enter through small wounds just as well as through big wounds. And a few infectious germs may breed millions.

There's danger in every pin-prick.

* * * *

Protect the wound, but don't apply a home-made bandage.

Don't use absorbent cotton which has been handled or exposed.

Make sure that everything touching a wound is aseptic.

* * * *

Call a physician if the wound is considerable. And be very careful in the meantime.

Keep gauze and bandages on hand, absorbent cotton and adhesive plaster.

We depend on no ordinary sterilization. B&B surgical dressings are twice sterilized—once after being sealed. It is done by costly apparatus, in the most efficient way.

They are packed in rooms filled with washed air. In rooms equipped like operating rooms. The workers are in uniform.

Then we take extreme measures to bring the products to you sterile—just as they left us.

* * * *

Don't take risks.

Careless laboratory methods are just as bad as utter disregard.

The brand B&B insures you against them. Every doctor, nurse and druggist knows that. Get for home use what they get for hospitals B&B double-sure dressings.

Always call the doctor—remember First Aid is only first aid

Insist on B&B

For safety's sake, in these home applications, insist on B&B.

They are made in a model laboratory, under ideal conditions.

They are made by chemists who, for 22 years, have been serving physicians and hospitals. And whom every surgeon respects.

Real Fumigation

Then when you fumigate use B&B Fumigators. They accord with Government recommendation. They are twice the usual strength.

Don't live where contagious disease has existed until you know that the germs are killed.

Half measures are worse than none. They simply make danger seem safe.

These things are all-important. You want competent help when you war on germs. You want absolute protection. You want the B&B care and quality and skill.

The Crimes We Commit Against Our Stomachs

By Arthur True Buswell, M. D.

Eugene Christian

A MAN'S success in life depends more on the co-operation of his stomach than on any other factor. Just as an "army moves on its stomach" so does the individual. Scientists tell us that 90% of all sickness is traceable to the digestive tract.

As Dr. Orison Swett Marden, the noted writer, says, "the brain gets an immense amount of credit which really should go to the stomach." And it's true—keep the digestive system in shape and brain vitality is assured.

Food is the fuel of the human system, yet some of the combinations of food we put into our systems are as dangerous as dynamite, soggy wood and a little coal would be in a furnace—and just about as effective. Is it any wonder that the average life of man today is but 39 years—and that diseases of the stomach, liver and kidneys have increased 103% during the past few years!

And yet just as wrong food selections and combinations will destroy our health and efficiency, so will the right foods create and maintain bodily vigor and mental energy. And by right foods we do not mean freak foods—just good, every day foods properly combined. In fact, to follow Corrective Eating it isn't even necessary to upset your table.

Not long ago I had a talk with Eugene Christian, the noted food scientist, who is said to have successfully treated over 23,000 people without drugs or medicines of any kind, and he told me of some of his experiences in the treatment of disease through food.

One case that interested me greatly was that of a young business man whose efficiency had been practically wrecked through stomach acidity, fermentation and constipation resulting in physical sluggishness which was naturally reflected in his ability to use his mind. He was twenty pounds underweight when he first went to see Christian and was so nervous he couldn't sleep. Stomach and intestinal gases were so severe that they caused irregular heart action and often fits of great mental depression. As Christian describes it he was not 50% efficient either mentally or physically. Yet in a few days, by following Christian's suggestions as to food, his constipation had completely gone although he had formerly been in the habit of taking large daily doses of a strong cathartic. In five weeks every abnormal symptom had disappeared—his weight having increased 6 lbs. In addition to this he acquired a store of physical and mental energy so great in comparison with his former self as to almost belie the fact that it was the same man.

Another instance of what proper food combinations can do was that of a man one hundred pounds over-weight whose only other discomfort was rheumatism. This man's greatest pleasure in life was eating. Though convinced of the necessity, he hesitated for months to go under treatment believing he would be deprived of the pleasures of the table. He finally, however, decided to try it out. Not only did he begin losing weight at once, quickly regaining his normal figure, all signs of rheumatism disappearing, but he found the new diet far more delicious to the taste and afforded a much keener quality of enjoyment than his old method of eating and he wrote Christian a letter to that effect.

But perhaps the most interesting case that Christian told me of was that of a multimillionaire—a man 70 years old who had been traveling with his doctor for several years in a search for health. He was extremely emaciated, had chronic constipation, lumbago and rheumatism. For over twenty years he had suffered with stomach and intestinal trouble which in reality was superaciduous secretions in the stomach. The first menus given him were designed to remove the causes of acidity, which was accomplished in about thirty days. And after this was done he seemed to undergo a complete rejuvenation. His eyesight, hearing, taste and all of his mental faculties became keener and more alert. He had had no organic trouble—but he was starving to death from malnutrition and decomposition—all caused by the wrong selection and combination of foods. After six months' treatment this man was as well and strong as he had ever been in his life.

These instances of the efficacy of right eating I have simply chosen at random from perhaps a dozen Eugene Christian told me of, every one of which was fully as interesting and they applied to as many different ailments. Surely this man Christian is doing a great work.

There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a little course of lessons which tells you exactly what to eat for health, strength and efficiency.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons including special summer menus which enable you to withstand the heat and retain winter's vigor.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist, because every possible point is so thoroughly covered and clearly explained that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will produce the increased physical and mental energy you are seeking the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal.

"Alleging." That is another vigorous word. Paul did not go hesitating, stumbling about his creed. He knew what he believed; he knew what he had seen and heard. He knew what Christ had done for himself and for others, and so he alleged "that this Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is Christ."

NEXT there is a little word which is hidden away in the English translation but which means a good deal when you see it in the Greek text. It is a strange word, hard to translate. It is a word that is easier to get the feeling of than to convey to others, the word "dei." High-school students, if they dipped into Greek, would find the word sort of a brother to their Latin phrase "necesse est" and yet it does not seem to be quite the same as our English expression, "it is necessary." King James translators rendered it here: "Must needs." The American Revision makes it: "It behooved." This version translates the word in this same way in Luke 24 : 26, for that mysterious Stranger talking to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus made use of the expression. In this passage in Luke, the King James translators rendered the expression: "Ought"—"Ought not Christ to have suffered these things?" But the idea of necessity is about the best we can do with the word in English. The suffering and death and resurrection of Jesus were things that had to be. There was deep need for them in the sinful, hard heart of the world. That heart had to be broken into tears by the spectacle of Calvary and quickened to new hope by the miracle of Easter. Philosophy may not be able to explain the atonement; but philosophy cannot explain away the fact that when sinful men hear the story of the cross and yield themselves to its power they become good. God being what he is, and sin being what it is, it was necessary for Christ to come, and live, and die, and rise again.

Notice again before leaving this verse the simplicity, the direct personal frankness, the clear-cut ringing enthusiastic positiveness of Paul's testimony: "This Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is Christ." Have we a definite statement to make like this, telling the world what Christ has done for us, and declaring what we know him to be?

THE result of this preaching and testifying was that some of the Jews believed the Gospel of Christ's salvation and came into close fellowship with Paul, Silas, and Timothy. Timothy is not mentioned in the early verses of this chapter, but verses 14 and 15 show that he was with Silas and Paul at this time. Many Greeks also believed, their number doubtless including some who had become proselytes to the Jewish faith, some who were still Gentiles.

Then that strange envy appeared again. Some Jews could not endure the thought that outsiders were to share in the spiritual riches of the Messiah's kingdom. They wanted their religion for themselves, so they engineered a demonstration in the city, and came to the house of Jason, where Paul and Silas were lodging, and tried to get hold of the trouble-making preachers. They did not happen to be in just then, but unfortunately for him, their host was in, and they carried him and some of the other Christian workers and believers to the police court. But what a splendid testimony the words of their accusation were! "These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also!"

This is precisely what Christian workers of every age ought to be doing. The world is wrongside up. The business of the church is to turn it rightside up. This must have sounded like extravagant language to these judges who heard it long ago in the ancient city of Salonica. What Paul and his friends had done so far was little indeed compared with the great religious system of Judaism and the great political system of the Roman Empire. But their opponents were shrewd enough to realize that these new teachings were absolutely revolutionary and would destroy Jewish exclusiveness and Roman imperialism.

IT would be an interesting study for the senior and adult classes to review briefly the centuries that have passed since these disciples were accu l of being world-overturners, to se how much has actually been accomp hed.

Another interesting discussion l be to fix now the points in which the rld, that is civilization, may still be d to be upside down and to require ri ing.

Clearest of all, the world is side down in its ideals of work. The w k of the world has two aspects, ind tries and commerce; that is, the prod tion and the exchange of commodities. Now we find, the world over, that th pirit and motive of this world's work that of gain. Everybody is trying to ke a profit out of somebody else. This rug-gle for profits makes competit in business and provokes war b veen nations. The murderous war in rope is simply this struggle for profits ised to its highest and most horrible te s.

Now the world will never be set ght-side up until this fundamental tive for work is changed. Men and men must work, not with the motive o ain, but with the motive of serving heir fellow men. They must work, t in competition, but in cooperation. hat the church and the world have mo need of now is for prophets against fits. Men who will declare that the mot es of greed and gain are motives that w lead inevitably to disaster and destruc n.

Christian workers must try to the world rightside up by showing t un-selfish spirit in their own work, by ving to put the spirit of cooperation i the form of actual laws, by trying to reak down the narrow standards of na nal-ism for the broader hopes and pu oses and enthusiasms of internationa n.

This was the teaching of the men who were accused at Thessalonica try-ing to set the world upside down. Paul had doubtless said already what w ave the record of his saying at Athens ittle later: "God hath made of one bl d all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth." (Acts 1 26.) Summing up his teachings t the Ephesians he declares that h had showed them "how that so labo g ye ought to support the weak, and re-member the words of the Lord esus, how he said, It is more blessed t give than to receive." (Acts 20: 35.) esus himself had said: "Other sheep have which are not of this fold. The also I must bring, and they shall h my voice. And there shall be one fo and one shepherd." (John 10: 16.)

THE other great mistake the w ld is making in its thought and a on is about God. In fact it makes ma mis-takes about him. It forgets tha e is kind; it forgets that he is just; for-gets that he is longing not so m for the worship and service of men s for their love and friendship. It is get-ting that he has declared that t way we are to serve him and show o love for him is by serving and lovi our fellow men. And it is our busi s to turn the thoughts and the hearts men rightside up—towards God.

Paul and Silas were released the officers, their host Jason giving ond that there would be no further d urb-ance. The preachers went on to er a and there again spoke to the ews. That is a splendid record the rean Jews earned in their treatment disciples: "These were more nob th those at Thessalonica, in that t re-ceived the word in all readiness o ind, and searched the Scriptures aily, whether these things were so."

That would be a good name d a good banner for a Sunday schoo lass, the "Scripture-Searchers." Re nber that in searching the Scriptures e are looking for the teachings of the Bible as a whole more than for the ach-ings of any special book or in Make Christ the central figure. Fin out what he said on any subject then remember that Paul, Peter, Jam and John were commissioned by th oly Spirit to sum up and to interp his life and words and the teaching that had gone before. Notice the wo "daily." Even a little study eve da will soon make you rich in Sc truth.

Here come trouble-making, n row-minded Jews again. This tim fro Thessalonica, trying to undo th good work of the disciples at Berea. Pa went on to Athens, leaving Sil and Timothy at Berea.

Dwellers on the Heights

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

WITH a final snort of the engine we reached the top of the mountain and stopped the car. Far, far down we could see the depths of a broad green valley, with one or two little homes nestling cosily in it. Below the level of our eyes we could see the sunlight filtering through the branches of a thousand trees green with the freshness of early June. Above us, on the highest branch of a tall fir, a vivid bird trilled his challenge to the world in a song that cut the stillness like a golden sword. We seemed infinitely high above the earth, poised there on the top of the mountain.

The boy at my side looked over the valley below us for a long time before he spoke. "It's very wonderful here," he said at last with a half sigh; "it's so very peaceful and quiet. It's so far above sordid things. I feel as if we were alone in a beautiful new world."

I echoed the sigh as I nodded my answer to his thought.

"I don't see," I said finally, "how anyone living like this—on a mountain top, could possibly be bad. Do you? If I lived here, I am sure I couldn't help loving everybody. I'm sure I would never lose my temper—I couldn't! I'm sure that I couldn't have an unkind thought in my mind!"

We were silent for another long moment, and then with a glance at the sun creeping toward the west, the boy gripped the steering wheel firmly and turned his eyes to the road that stretched, ribbon-like, ahead. With an understanding whirr the car started down the hill toward the valley and the little white homes that nestled cosily among the greenness of the trees. But though we soon reached level ground my heart stayed on the mountain top, and the song of the vivid bird thrilled in the depths of my soul.

IT must be very wonderful to live on a mountain top, far above the troubles and struggles and disappointments of a too busy world. It must be wonderful to live high up—half way, almost, to heaven—where the sun shines warmly in the day time, and the stars loom large as great silver lamps at night. It must indeed be far easier to be good, to do kind deeds and to think beautiful thoughts, when one lives upon a mountain top.

Long years back, when the world was centuries younger and our ancient history was in the making, folk worshiped gods and goddesses. They believed that strange powers in human form had control of thunder and lightning and rain and sunshine; they believed that other all-powerful beings were the creators of love and hate, or sadness and happiness; of war and peace and famine. These gods and goddesses were real, very real, to the people; so real that folk in their imaginations endowed them with names and faces, with characteristics and emotions. They were so very real that great artists and sculptors made them the subjects of their greatest work.

It was perhaps a problem to know where these gods and goddesses should live, for the ancients did not have our idea of heaven. I do not know just how it came to be understood, but people arrived at the belief that the divine beings dwelt in a temple on the top of a very high mountain called Olympus.

Probably the gods were supposed to live on a mountain top so that they could look down on the people of earth. But I am inclined to think that the ancient wise men felt that a mountain top was the only fitting place for an immortal to live. One could not imagine the dwellers on such a height to be anything but great people—incapable of doing any but great deeds.

Unfortunately, everybody in the world cannot dwell on a mountain top. There aren't enough mountains, and if there were enough, many of us would still have to live in the cities where there is bread to be bought and money to be earned for the buying of it. Only a very few people of all the millions in the world can have the joy of watching the sun rise not far above them, but on a level with their eyes. That's the way it looks from the top of a mountain. Only a very few can look down on a world of men struggling, far below, for existence.

I USED to know a girl who was given to fits of extreme melancholia. She used to give way to her feelings for several days at a time, bothering her office associates (for she did clerical work on the tenth floor of a dingy old building) with her moods, and frightening her family, when she went home at night, with her crying spells. Her moods used to be worse than temper, worse because they were more unexplainable and infinitely more annoying.

I used to see the girl very often. And then, through a change of business, we failed to meet for over a year. The change, when I first saw her after that length of time, was startling. For the girl's disposition was almost sunny.

"You seem much happier lately," I said to her the other day. "And I can't help wondering why."

"I am happier," the girl answered; "I'm happier because I have learned to control my moods."

"How did you learn?" I questioned.

"One day," the girl told me, "I was in one of my bluest moods. I was so unhappy that I stood in the window and cried big tears as I looked down into the street ten stories below. And then, suddenly, through my tears, I noticed that the street was filled with a crowd of men and women, all hurrying toward the middle of the road where a wagon stood. I could see, dimly, that the wagon had lost a wheel, and that the driver was adjusting it.

"From ten stories up it looked very small to me, to attract the attention of so many people. And then, suddenly, I wondered if I wouldn't seem very small and futile to them, and if my griefs wouldn't seem a farce if they could look up at me. I felt as if I were on a mountain top, far above them, and I felt as if my mind should be far up, too. . . . Since then, whenever I feel blue, I stand in the window and look down, and the blueness passes away!"

THE girl will, probably, never live on a mountain peak. But in the depths of her soul she has been able to create a height to live on, and the sunlight is beginning to creep into her heart—pure sunlight from a spot nearer heaven than earth. We who struggle along in commonplace little towns in cities, on the wide flat prairies, can find mountain tops to dwell on, too, if we have the ambition and the courage to hunt for them.

REV. W. HAGQVIST, of the Scandinavian Mission at Sian, Shensi Province, China, writes to the Christian Herald under date of April 28, "We are in a very serious situation in this part of China. Famine is staring the people of Shensi and Kansuh provinces in the face. Last year we had no autumn crop and the prices of food went up very much. Later on, we had some rain and the farmers could sow their wheat, and we thought the danger of famine was over. But this spring we have had no rain, and the wheat and everything else in the ground is drying up. The people have no hopes of any harvest. The price of food is very high; wheat is four or five times higher than in ordinary seasons. It is a dreadful situation for the poor people. We are afraid that thousands and thousands will starve to death if help is not forthcoming soon. Because of the internal trouble in China, and especially in these provinces, there is little hope that any relief can be raised locally. Owing to the war, no help can be expected from Europe. Our hope must, therefore, rely on the kind hearts of the American people."

PASADENA, Cal., has no saloons, but in Los Angeles, nine miles distant, they are plentiful. In Pasadena is a colored janitor, who is an ardent temperance man. One day he was accosted by a stranger, who said, "Can you tell me where I can get a drink?" Now it happens that the aforesaid janitor, in addition to his temperance proclivities, is of an accommodating disposition, so he said, "Certainly; just go to the next corner, then walk straight south for nine miles, and you can get all the drink you want."

Performance—Past and Present

The ordinary car does the ordinary thing. It has power—to a limited extent; it has flexibility and smoothness—to a limited degree.

But you judge from your point of view only. Your idea of performance is based on the car you are accustomed to.

That's wrong.

How can you pit 1916 luxuries against the annoyances, inconveniences and shortcomings of several seasons ago?

Come out of the past into the present and future. Come up to date. Climb into the big, beautiful Cole Eight. Get a new thrill—a Cole Eight thrill.

Feel its soft, spirited, velvety action; its giant locomotive power; its smooth, certain flexibility.

Then you'll know why more and more people are realizing the sense and prudence of paying a few hundred dollars more rather than a few hundred dollars less.

It's just the difference between the past and the present.

REAL PEOPLE AND DREAMS Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., does not make up her stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind as winter sprites trace wonderful pictures on window-panes, and then simply because she cannot help herself, she sets down a description of these pictures. There are, in all, in her new book, "Real People and Dreams," about eighty poems and thirty-two short stories and sketches. This is the work of a genius.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a new photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster, herself, and with illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

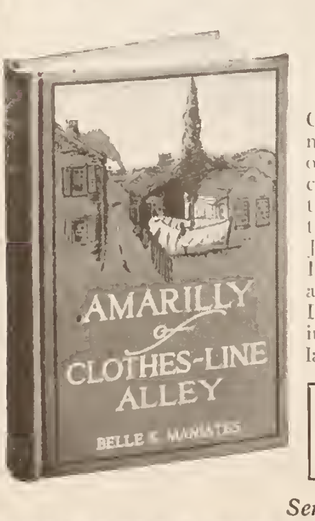
CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

"AMARILLY"

In Book Form



We have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the Boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story. In the human appeal, sweet humor, and genuine cheeriness between its covers, there will await you many laughs; and a tear or two as well.

We will send "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," attractively bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $2.00. Or, we will send "Amarilly" to old subscribers as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.00.

Questions and Answers

W. H. Robinson, Kan. Many who claim to be sanctified pass very harsh judgment upon strangers who do not, and concerning whose lives they know nothing. They also judge other denominations. I fail to see any humility or Christianity in such a spirit.

You are quite right in saying that those who profess a high state of grace should refrain from judging others harshly. Humility is the highest form and manifestation of holiness. And John Wesley, the great apostle of Christian holiness, in defining his position and emphasizing the fact that that holiness is, first and last, a matter of love, declared that "those who seek anything higher than love or anything other than love go wide of the mark." Humility and love always characterize true holiness. The fact should be recognized, however, that there is so much worldliness and inconsistency and selfishness to be found among those who profess the name of Christ that prophets and teachers of the pure Gospel find it hard to be always soft and soothing. Jesus was fierce at times in denouncing wrong-doing, especially in those who professed to be followers of God. All the great apostles and teachers have been stern at times. We are warned against judging, but we are also admonished to declare to the people "all the counsel of God."

C. H. D., Spring Hill, Kan. A wrong that affects no one but God and ourselves needs to be confessed only to God. Confession is helpful and Scriptural (see James 5: 16), but there are cases in which a public confession would be a positive injustice to others, who should not be made to suffer.

Mrs. H. M., Okarche, Okla. It is a delicate question just how far the church and its affiliated organizations should cater to the desire for amusement for the young people. There are many amusements which, taken out of their usual surroundings, are unobjectionable, and may thus be made to serve a good purpose. But the choice should be made with discretion, and certainly should not take in any form of amusement that has a bad name, or which is likely to lead to bad associations.

J. B. Foote, Delavan, Ill., writes: "In your article, 'Friend Farmer,' I see you are interested in a very perplexing question. Christianity applied will solve the question. We live in the finest country in God's world. It makes me sad to see the enormous waste of products all about us. While so many people are in need, and even starving, we will be held responsible for this. Farmers force the soil and then a large percentage of the products are never made use of in any way. This seems a sin. Let the farmer turn his attention to producing things that are scarce, such as cattle and their products and other neglected things, and raise less grain, and then make use of everything that will enrich the soil, so that it will never lose its strength. And let him save all products, that nothing be lost. Then there should be a more practical way of getting farm products from producer to consumer. There should be exchange wagons carrying certain lines of merchandise—going right to the farmer's door—which would buy or trade for what the farmer has to sell. Then market these products to the best advantage. General delivery wagons could go right to the consumers' door and sell these products. The surplus should be stored and kept till the time of need."

J. F. S., Elizabeth, N. J. 1. What is the sin with which all people are said to be born? 2. Was Mary the mother of Jesus born without this sin? 3. Was Joseph? 4. Is it right to go to holy communion with an unkind feeling in the heart toward any one?

1. The doctrine of inbred sin is clearly taught in the Scriptures. It means that all human beings inherit a tendency to do wrong and to keep themselves from God's companionship. This native root of sin manifests itself in many different ways, but its two chief characteristics are a disregard for the rights or welfare or happiness of others and a personal antagonism, or rebellion, or wilful alienation from God. 2. The doctrine of the immaculate conception, or the belief that the Virgin Mary was conceived and born without sin, is not taught in the Scriptures, and was not adopted as an article of Catholic faith till past the middle of the nineteenth century. This doctrine must not be confused with that of the Virgin Birth, which teaches that Jesus was born without a human father. 3. The Catholic Cl ch does not teach that Joseph was without i ed sin. 4. The heart should of course be p ed of all unkindness before taking the sacra nt, but if unkind feelings remain after on as tried to expel them and is willing to do e rything in his power to restore friendly rel ons with the estranged acquaintance, there no wrong in going to the sacred table. In ed. the blessing there received may bring the ace of kindness back to the heart. As the s is flooded with love for the Saviour it wi eel kindly toward all men, even to those who ve wronged it.

Some of our readers, having inqui of Pastor Sheldon whether he knew of a one who had ever tried to put into practi the principles set forth in "In His Steps Dr. Sheldon has sent this reply to the Ch tian Herald: "I have known of several or izations, including Endeavor Societies, nu s i hospitals, and student bodies, that hav ried to live up to the motto, 'What woul sus do?' As for myself, it would be presum ous to say I have ever succeeded in living o uch an ideal; but I think I can honestly say ave applied the question in daily life, and as for wisdom and grace to answer it."

Mrs. J. A. S., Plano, Iowa. What b ism is referred to in I Cor. 12: 13- baptism with water or baptism wi th Spirit?

The reference here seems to be quite arly to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. To b baptized with the Spirit is a common exp sion in the New Testament, and the idea h expressed is that the baptism with th Hol Spirit unifies the Christian believers. e illustration Paul uses here is exact and f eful. The War in Europe captured the northern portion of the moat surrounding the fort, though the French retain their positions in the rest of the moat and in the fort itself.

Monday the positions of the combatants changed little. The weather changed to heavy rain with some fog, and further infantry fighting became out of the question but the artillery activities became more intense. The immediate region of Fort Vaux was the storm center on Tuesday. Both sides claim to have inflicted heavy losses. Wednesday, on the west front, only a violent artillery duel took place south of Hill 304. On the north front the French reported a heavy bombardment of their first and second lines from Douaumont to Damloup. Fort Vaux was rushed by the Germans during the night of Wednesday to Thursday and taken after a most heroic defense by the French, who fought almost superhumanly. About 500 prisoners went to the Germans with the fort, the capture of which forced the French back on the whole Verdun front to their second line of defense, after a battle lasting since the 23d of February.

During Thursday there was intense artillery activity south of Hill 304 and in the region of Chattancourt on the west front, but no infantry action; while on the north front the Germans after a bombardment, made an infantry attack on the French positions east and west of Thiaumont farm, but were repulsed. Friday there was a hard general attack by the Germans on the whole French second line of defense on the northern front, which battle was still raging when this record closed.

There has been very hard fighting between the Germans and Canadians on the Flanders end of the front northeast of Ypres, north of Zillebeke and Hill 60, the scene of such frightful carnage last year about this time. This fighting really began ten days or so ago, but has been lost sight of to a large degree amid the more exciting events elsewhere; but the struggle here has been desperate. Finally, the Canadians were driven back and the village of Hooge and the trenches behind it captured by the Germans. The Canadians put up a magnificent fight, as their casualty list, still incomplete, of 180 officers and between five and six thousand men eloquently testifies.

In the Caucasus the Turks are gaining ground, particularly in the center. In Poland, the Russians, in addition to taking the strategically important town of Lutsk, one of the triangle of Volhynian fortresses, claim to have captured since June 4, 65,000 prisoners, among whom were many Germans, besides a vast quantity of war supplies of all kinds and a considerable quantity of artillery. In Galicia, on the lower Stripa, they also claim a considerable advance, and Lemberg appears to be the great objective of this sweeping drive.

The Austrians admit that in this fighting they have given some ground, but deny the strategic importance of the ground ceded and claim that it was purchased at a loss of life entirely out of proportion to the gain secured. They state that the Russian casualties already exceed 50,000 and that the Russian commander, Bursiloff, seems absolutely careless of life. This general, it will be remembered, commanded Russia's Carpathian campaign in the winter of 1914–15, and in the spring was hurled back with the rest of the Russian forces.

The Austro-Italian line has been the scene of violent fighting over its entire length. Monday the Austrians to the southeast of Asiago, in the direction of Caltrano, made marked progress, capturing the town of Cesuna and all of the eastern slopes and the crest of Monte Cengio, the Italians being driven as far down this mountain's western slopes as Sohiri, at which point they managed to stand their ground. In the latter part of the week, the fighting became very hard south of the Posina-Astico line, but there seems to have been no important change of positions. The Italians appear to have rallied some and are putting up a better defense.

THE facts of the North Sea naval battle of May 31 to June 1 still remain to a large degree shrouded in obscurity. It appears certain that the action began in a combat between destroyers, and that this gradually developed, as the more important forces of the adversaries successively came up, into a battle of the greatest magnitude, in which finally all the more important vessels of both fleets were engaged. It does not seem that either side is entitled to claim a decisive victory, but this is a matter of opinion, as the British and German accounts of the ultimate outcome of the battle are directly contradictory, both sides claiming to have remained in possession of the field of action, and there being no evidence of any kind from impartial sources tending to confirm either.

No official report of the battle has yet been received from either the British or German admirals, so we can only summarize the results. The losses as far as the British are concerned remain the same as stated last week. To the German losses then stated are to be added the battle cruiser Lützow and the small cruiser Rostock. The Lützow was one of the very newest and most effective vessels of the German navy and, considering the small number of equivalent ships the German navy possesses, her loss is an important one. The Rostock is of no very great account. These two vessels sank while attempting to make port. The crews of both were saved. These two vessels, added to the losses previously admitted, make the total German tonnage loss 60,720, and of the British 117,750. Undoubtedly other vessels in both fleets were very badly damaged as well.

The British admit the loss of 333 officers, including two admirals, six captains and twelve commanders. On the usual proportion of casualties between officers and men this would indicate a casualty list of about 7,000 men. The Germans report the saving of some 197 officers and men of the various British vessels which were sunk, who are now in their hands, prisoners of war. No official statement of the German losses has yet been issued.

Hughes Is Nominated

which he increased to 328 on the second ballot. The convention was becoming more and more enthusiastic. There was evidence that Hughes' strength was growing and that another ballot would probably result in his nomination.

The Conference Committee met again on Friday night, the Republicans this time presenting Hughes, the Progressives refusing to accept him. Both Committees reported back to their Conventions the fact of their disagreement.

On Saturday, with the failure of the conferees to agree, both conventions proceeded to ballot, the Progressives nominating Theodore Roosevelt just three minutes before the Republicans, by an unprecedented vote, had chosen as their leader and candidate Charles Evans Hughes of New York. The Progressive Convention had scarcely more than nominated the Colonel when a dispatch was read from him which, while in the form of a conditional refusal of the nomination, was considered by all the delegates as absolute. The Convention adjourned after giving authority to the National Committee to fill vacancies in the ticket. The Republican Convention nominated former Vice-President Charles Warren Fairbanks of Indiana who was Roosevelt's running mate in 1904, and adjourned.

It was evident before the voting began on that day that no power within the convention could prevent the nomination of Hughes. Nearly all the other candidates released delegates from their pledges before the balloting began. In the roll call of states no ballot was cast for any but Hughes until Maryland was reached when one ballot of the sixteen went to Roosevelt. On the final ballot, out of 987 votes, Mr. Hughes received 949½, Roosevelt 18½, the votes necessary for a choice being 494. The Republican Convention adjourned without knowledge of the withdrawal of Colonel Roosevelt from the race, but many Progressive and Republican politicians saw in his withdrawal evidence that he would support Hughes. The outcome at Chicago switched the attention of the country upon the Democratic convention convening on June 14 in St. Louis. The Republican fight is to be made largely upon the preparedness issue which Mr. Roosevelt had created. The platform claims strong declaration for the protection of American rights, deplores the vacillation and weaknesses of our Mexican policy, reaffirms the approval of the Monroe Doctrine and makes the usual Republican declarations regarding the tariff. The Democrats plan to make their campaign upon the slogan, "Peace, prosperity and preparedness." It is expected that President Wilson will be nominated by acclamation and that the platform which he has drafted will be adopted without dissent.

The Funeral of Dogtown

By A. A. JEFFREY

BACK in the early days of Maryville, Missouri, there came to be a portion of the town that seemed set part for poverty and human wretchedns. As truly as misery loves company, it found ample companionshi there. And the bearers of these gal g burdens, besides comforting theselves with the knowledge that the were no worse off than their immeate neighbors, found additional sola in the constancy and unquestioning spect of equally ill-favored dogs—lo in such numbers that this quarter—t Fourth Ward of the village—bece ne known as Dogtown.

Iery evil institution found the elenes necessary for its growth and pertuation in Dogtown. There was jus one thing in which Dogtown could hol up its head with the other three wa s in Maryville, and that was in its votg strength. The Fourth Ward wa the saloon ward, and its strength wa concertedly used and with telling effe whenever the permanency of the loc saloon was threatened. And as the city grew and the Fourth Ward gre with it, poverty and wretchedness maged to keep pace with them, so tha Dogtown lost none of the charactistics which, from the first, had ma the name appropriate.

I Maryville's first local option fight, in 07, Dogtown, in its own strength, add 150 to the preponderance of wet sennent, and made the saloon's viery a decisive one. In 1912, after fiveyears of earnest educational effort, the emperance workers of Maryville for d the issue once more and matched the strength with that of the saloons. Mabe they could carry their point in spi of Dogtown. The first three wa s of the city responded to the imtus of progress and civic righteousnes But Dogtown, ever low, had goi lower still. Alone of all the wa s it had gone backward; the we had increased their lead in Dogtov from 150 to 155—enough to set asi the good work of the other wards and give the saloon more than half a hdred votes to make its victory sure. Iving again matched their strength wit the enemy, the good people of Maryville resigned themselves to four more years of whisky rule. And Dogtown settled back among its wrecked lives, its joyless homes, its unpaved streets, its unpainted hovels, its bottles, its brothels and its dogs—just Dogtown.

THE Baptist church of Maryville chances to be in the old Fourth Ward, and in 1913 Lewis M. Hale became its pastor. The house in which Mr. and Mrs. Hale set up housekeeping was in the Fourth Ward. That his church came to be called the Dogtown Church and he the "Dogtown preacher" made no difference to young Mr. Hale. This Missouri boy, having been assigned a charge in a wet town, and finding himself set down in its wettest quarter, went directly about his Master's work. And the work that was most manifestly in need of doing was to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the men who were in sorest need of it.

He began to preach a personal, sympathetic, everyday Gospel to the men—in their homes, at their work, in his church. He was fearless, straightforward and practical. He took men warmly by the hand. He looked them squarely in the eye. He was quick to see the good that lay deep down in their souls; and he was ever ready to point out the way of reconciliation between the soul and its Maker. The men of Dogtown, whatever else might be said of them, were practical, and they liked this young man, for he was square.

The fourth Sunday night that Lewis M. Hale preached in his Maryville pulpit there came forward, under deep conviction, a man named Abbott. Abbott was the "Dogtown policeman," commissioned by the city and paid by the saloons to keep order among their patrons at the bar. His had been no insignificant part in piling up the appalling majorities that Dogtown had given the saloon in former years. But on the last Sunday night in September, 1913, Officer Abbott was converted, and from that hour his allegiance was with the cause of righteousness.

Not only on his Sundays was the young preacher at work. His was a personal campaign. He worked with men wherever and whenever he found them. He induced many a man to sign the pledge—not for the city or for the church, or even for the Lord, but for the wornout wife and wistful children who so needed the earnings that were being spent for drink. He met these men with a man's directness, appealed to their manhood, and convinced them with a man's argument. He carried no cheesecloth banners embroidered with "Down With the Saloon." His banner was a personal "Up With the Man."

HALE worked earnestly away, preaching the Gospel to every man within the possible limits of his influence, whether resident in the Old Fourth or the Temperate Third; whether a "Dogtowner" or "one of our foremost citizens." They all looked alike to Hale. And the Men's Organized Bible Class grew and grew. By the second winter they had outgrown their corner in the church. So every Sunday during the months of February, March and April they marched to the court-house and met in the special court-room for their class work, and at its close they would all march back to the church—sometimes 118 strong! A fully officered company of men enlisted and fighting on the Lord's side! And most of these men were residents of the Fourth Ward. For three months they used their special quarters in the court-house, paying for the heat and janitor service out of their own pockets. Meanwhile, with $250 from the same source, they were finishing a new classroom in the rear of the church—a splendid room, with seating capacity for more than a hundred men. And in this room, equipped with their own contributions and set apart expressly for their use, these men have regularly met since May 1, 1915.

With the aid of the present moderator of the Northwest Missouri Baptist Association, the writer went over the church books the other day just to see what possible effect the work of this Bible class may have had on the recent local option election in Maryville. We found that 113 men—qualified electors—had been converted and joined the church from the old Fourth Ward alone since September 1, 1913!

And what effect might this have had at the election? The bare figures do not begin to tell the story. The entire membership of the Men's Organized Bible Class became a working unit in the pre-election campaign. Two nights before the final day the class gave a voters' banquet at the church, and to this came more than 300 men.

SO on the morning of February 3, 1916, Maryville faced her enemy for the last time. And this time it was not necessary to carry the election "in spite of Dogtown"; for Dogtown was leading the fight for civic righteousness! One hundred men of the old Fourth Ward, with Lewis M. Hale among them, were at the polling places working for dry votes from earliest morning till the last vote was in. And when the votes were counted, the old Fourth Ward—Dogtown—was next to the head of the dry column, just 9 votes below the Temperate Third, and away ahead of the First and the Second Wards. The First went dry by 137, the Second by 156, the Third by 209, and the Fourth by 200. The drys had it that day in Maryville by a majority of 702!

And that is not all. Two weeks later they buried the name that the old Fourth Ward had borne since the time "to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." They buried the name "Dogtown," and Lewis M. Hale preached the funeral sermon before the largest audience ever assembled in the Maryville Baptist Church.

After Church

They all had been to church that day,
But at the dinner table
Not one of them could give the text Except dear Uncle Abel.

Beulah remarked that Mrs. Brown
Had worn a brand new bonnet,
And Sally said there surely was
Some last year's trimming on it.

Father had met a college chum:
"Fine fellow! Name is Arno."
Then mother said she thought the choir
Had got a nice soprano.

And Jim scoffed, "Huh! that girl can't sing!
Such noise is only screeching."
Then Uncle Abel sighed, and guessed
They hadn't heard the preaching.

"Oh, I did, uncle!" now piped up
Their eager, wide-eyed Benny;
"And when the man passed round the change
I only took a penny."

Christianity and Preparedness

In the New Testament we are informed that Jesus Christ came into the world to reveal God. Are we to credit this as truth? If so, ought there not to be a universal anxiety to know God and regard it as the highest privilege? For we are assured this is eternal life. Are we not forced to recognize the fact that, while the leading nations of the world accept the Bible as truth, though they may differ as to its interpretation, there is a marvelous failure to comply with its teaching? The idea practically accepted is that upon armies and navies—and not upon divine providence and blessing—we are to depend.

When Christ was asked, "What is the great commandment of the law?" he said, "The first and great commandment is, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

How is it that the President of the United States, in his recommendation to his fellow rulers and to citizens, wholly omits obedience to God as a necessity for prosperity in this world and for happiness in the world to come? He accepts the delusion that patriotism or love of country is the first duty of the citizen.

In contrast, what is required as a first duty is piety, which means love of God. Does not the President's action suggest that, in his conception of truth, he falls short of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, and that his failure to put God's will as the first duty of the citizen suggests a kind of Christianity which is not that which Christ taught? How absurd is the failure of our legislative bodies to remember that "the things that are seen are temporal, and the things unseen are eternal!" Many people do not accept the fact that there are eternal things to be considered which we all must meet.

If the United States were to rest its appeal for peace in the world upon divine command, the effort would surely not be in vain. What a miserable substitute is the enlistment of an immense army and the multiplication of naval vessels, all sorts of instruments of destruction, and large financial outlay!

When Christ was requested to give a form of prayer that would be acceptable to God, he included the petition, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." In the light of the present activities of the world, what an insult to God is this prayer! John C. Havemeyer.

"JUST DAVID"
By Eleanor H. Porter
Author of "Pollyanna"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

ONE REGIMENT (1000 – 7 = 993 Dead)

The regiment lay waiting.

Phantom searchlight shafts swept to and fro, like stately Northern Lights.

The ground heaved convulsively. Great black columns of dirt shot upward.

Acrid fumes drove in their faces.

A fine dust settled slowly. Their uniforms grew white.

Pandemonium reigned.

Suddenly they were charging. Five feet—ten feet—scrambling and staggering over the rotten ground, they ran

The enemy's fire quickened. Shrapnel burst among them. The clattering rifle noise rose in fury. Whole companies melted away.

Athwart the wires, among the shell-pits, they fell. The dead close packed supported one another.

Later: seven mutilated men crawled back.

Their regiment was but a name.

"I AM COME THAT THEY MIGHT HAVE LIFE."

Children's Teeth

require "inside" treatment as much as outward care.

Soft teeth, spongy gums and other tooth defects are due largely to a lack of certain vital mineral salts in the daily diet. Parents can help the children to have sounder, healthier teeth by selecting food rich in these important elements.

Grape-Nuts

—a delicious food

made from whole wheat and malted barley—is full of the rich nutriment of these grains, including their mineral elements, so essential for good teeth.

Questions and Answers

ANXIOUS, Council Bluffs, Ia What Biblical proof have we that the threats, admonitions and promises of the prophets, the Saviour, and the apostles apply to the people of the present day? Must the people of the present time follow the teachings of the old Bible? If not, why do ministers preach from it?

We get the greatest help from the Bible when we approach it with the idea that it is a book of principles rather than a book of detailed rules of conduct. For instance, polygamy was clearlys anctioned in the Old Testament and is not definitely rebuked in the New. Christ condemned unjust divorces and strongly inferred the principle of monogamy in his great statement about the permanency of the marriage tie (Matt. 19 : 6; Mark 10 : 9), but we have no record that he denounced in so many words polygamy, nor slavery, nor the drinking of intoxicants. But the principles he enunciated did at length end slavery and have practically put an end to polygamy, while he is recognized today as the leader of the forces against King Alcohol His principles, principles of sentiment, motive and duty, if they are accepted and acted upon, do, in time, make the details of social duty clear. Paul's advice to the early Christians not to let women speak in the churches has caused much dismay to holy women who are convinced that they bad a message from the Holy Spirit to deliver. The church at large has now come clearly to understand that these words of Paul were to be applied to a particular time and place. The Bible shows us the way into the friendship of Jesus; it shows us how we may receive the Holy Spirit himself into our souls; it shows us how we may have our hearts filled with mighty love, love for God, and love for those for whom the Saviour died. And "love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." But very many passages do give us not only principles but precise directions as well. The Holy Spirit will enlighten a trustful and obedient soul, and guide groups of believers, emphasizing the passages that can be related to present duties. After all, the most wonderful thing about the Bible is that it is a record of the lives of men who lived in intimate communion with God and received his abundant grace in their souls. It is a challenge and an invitation to every human being to come into like close fellowship with God and be his friend. It teaches human brotherhood. If it were really given a chance the Bible would reconstruct society, making earth like heaven, full of love and joy and peace. Because the Bible is this kind of a book and does these things ministers preach from it.

Mrs. K. A. S., Trilby, Fla. The plural of "shale" is "shales," and of "obsidian" "obsidians." The latter is named after Obsius, a scientist who discovered in Asia the peculiar kind of glassy volcanic rock so named. "Marbles" is a plural of "marble" that is frequently used.

Mrs. J. H. M., East Orange, N. J. The hymn you refer to is by Fanny Crosby and begins with the words,

> "Saviour, more than life to me,
> I am clinging, clinging close to thee."

It is hymn 593 in Gospel Hymns, Nos. 1-6, and 490 in the new Methodist Hymnal.

H. E. E., New Orleans, La. The Bible is God's message to the human race, given through inspiration by holy men, whom he specially chose for that purpose. We are sending you a booklet, written by the editor of the Christian Herald, which will be found helpful in getting a clearer understanding of this great subject. For your other question, we would suggest that you write to the U. S. Pension Bureau, Washington, D. C., for accurate information.

J. L. H., Boston, Mass. Tradition must be clearly distinguished from myth. There are unquestionably may traditions that must find acceptance by logical minds, and that have been preserved orally up to the point where they merge in recorded history. Tertullian (220 A.D.) writes of Britain as having received Christianity, although not yet reached by the Romans. Eusebius states that some of the apostles preached in Britain. More recent writers, including Stillingfleet and Cave, give Paul as the founder of Christianity there. Clemens Romanus (A. D. 101) says Paul went to "the limits of the West" and Theodoret (A.D. 457) says Paul "brought salvation to the isles of the ocean." Still these, though accepted, are not history but tradition, and cannot be held to be conclusive. As to the other traditions you mention, we are familiar with those that assert that the apostles James and Simon Zelotes and Joseph of Arimathea visited and preached in Britain about A D 35, and that the last-named died there; also that a Christian church existed there and had many martyrs during the persecutions by Diocletian. The names of only three of these martyrs are actually recorded, namely, Alban, Aaron and Julius. With the exception of these three, all the rest is tradition and incapable of proof, yet it is tradition of a character which historians cannot overlook. One of the most important historic facts of that early period is the attendance of three British bishops at a great church council at Arles (A D. 314), whose signatures to the official record of the event are substantial evidence that Christianity had already made solid growth in their own country. The account of Lazarus, accompanied by Mary and Martha, visiting Marseilles and preaching there, is legend, rather than tradition.

J E. H., Parkersburg W. Va. 1. At the first great council of the church, when the question was discussed whether the Gentile converts should be required to obey the Jewish law, it was decided that only four observances should be required of them. (See Acts 15.) The observance of the Jewish Sabbath was not one of the four, and the Gentile Christians do not appear to have ever kept it. The Rabbis had made it ridiculous by a host of absurd regulations. The writings of the early Fathers show that very early in the Christian era, if not in Apostolic times, the first day of the week was uniformly the day of religious meeting and abstinence from secular labor, thus celebrating the new Creation as the Jewish Sabbath celebrated the old 2 In Matt 5 : 17-20 Jesus made it clear that he came not to abrogate but to fulfil the law and to unfold its spiritual meaning, which had been obscured and distorted by Jewish misinterpretation. His language was a rebuke to the formalism and the complex ceremonial system of the Scribes and Pharisees

A SONG of VIOLETS

By Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

SING a song of violets,
Sparkling springtime skies,
Grasses green as velvet,
Happy smiling eyes.

Sing a song of sunshine,
Laughter lilting low,
Gentle fairy breezes,
Crooning as they blow.

Sing a song of woodlands,
Mossy carpets spread;
Clouds as white as snowdrifts
Floating overhead.

Sing a song of baskets,
Filled with purple spoil;
Sing of little fingers,
Happy as they toil.

Sing a song of childhood,
Free from fear or pain,
Blooming like the blossoms
In the sun and rain!

Sing a song of violets,
Perfume in the air!
Children, sun and flowers
Make the world more fair.

Reader, Greensburg, Pa. 1. Your first question is quite out of our line 2. In such a case as you mention, where you had promised to keep silence, and where no wrong was involved by your doing so, you might have avoided trouble by simply saying nothing Talking around a subject may be smart, but it is apt to lead to equivocation. Better leave sec alone, or if you cannot do so, be more careful next t and speak of something else. The matter would be made worse by reopening it.

Subscriber, Waynesboro, Miss. 1. Imagination is of the finest gifts God has given to man, and kep rein, and with reason as a guide, it is not apt to ru excess. Unchecked, it may lead to danger and to 2 You have a right to counsel a friend who has do real wrong; but your advice should not take a ho or aggressive form, but ought rather to be kind persuasive. Tact is essential in such a case.

H. M. L., Du Bois, Pa. The brothers of Jesus, called in the New Testament, were James, J Simon and Judas. We are told that in the early st of his ministry his own brethren did not believe him (John 7 : 5), whereas, in the later narrativ would seem that some of them at least must yielded to his claims, for in Acts 1 : 13, 14 we find names of three of them included among the eleven is a disputed question whether they were full brot or cousins, but most commentators hold that they the sons of Joseph and Mary.

Reader, Tabor, Ia. It is a very serious responsib which a parent incurs who neglects the material spiritual welfare of his or her own household. I especially so in the case of a mother, whose first should be to her children. Many excellent Chris mothers find time to do religious work without negl ing their homes. There are cases where a member household is evidently called to work of this charac and it would be wrong to put an obstacle in the wa she can do it without omitting any of her real h duties. It must be admitted that cases where this be done are very rare. Home has the first claim u the mother's time and attention, and it is her influe probably more than all others combined, that fc the character in childhood that is to determine moral, spiritual and industrial value of the ri generation. "Home-keeping hearts are happi says the poet. God's Word gives the highest trib to the good wife and mother, whose home is her r realm, where she reigns as queen, exerting an influe through her noble example and the training of children, that is felt throughout the world.

O. J. V., Keene, N. H. Friedrich Wilhelm Kr macher (born at Mors, Germany, 1796, died at Pots 1868) was one of the great German divines of the century. He was educated at Halle, and held suc sively pastorates at Frankfort-on-Main, Ruhr Gemarke, and Elberfeld. Removing to United Sta he was for a time with the Reformed Ger Church. In 1847 he was called to be pastor of Tri Church, Berlin, and two years later became c preacher at Potsdam. His devotional writings widely known. He was a bold preacher of evangel truth. According to the estimate of Dr. Philip Sc Dr. Krummacher was one of the most brilliant gifted pulpit orators of his day, an eminent theolog a fertile and original thinker, and with a familia with the Bible that delighted all who heard him or read his books. He was the uncompromising fo rationalism and infidelity.

F. J. D., Farmington, W. Va. The proprietor garage raffled off an automobile at one dollar chance. A member of the church bought a cha and got the lucky number, thereby receiving automobile. Is it consistent with the principle Christian conduct for a church member to partici in such affairs?

Positively no. The laws recognize the moral wrong and corrupting influence of gambling and lotteries. It is one of most singular inconsistencies of present-day life that so m moral and professedly religious persons, who condemn antagonize gambling and who would antagonize a movem to restore the protection and patronage of the state to pu lotteries, will still indulge in this modern custom of tak chances. It is even worse when the thing is done under auspices of some welfare or charity movement, and still w when it is under the patronage of a church, as is sometimes case. A church member stultifies himself by taking part such affairs.

The Orient De Luxe

By WILLARD PRICE

Photographs by the Author

WHEN we began considering a trip to the Orient my wife had several bad dreams. They were a movie of jumbled jarrings in rickshas, bumpings in Peking carts innoce of springs, joltings in equally innocent wheelbaows, falls over precipices from loosely held panquins, and other such unhappy experiences. Tl hardships of travel in the Far East weighed heily upon her.

he imagination of Americans is leaden-footed. It annot keep up with the swift changes that are ta ng place on the other side of the world. The avage Western notion regarding the Orient is about twity years behind the times. Let m tell a few of the marvels which surised us into a new conception of th alchemy at work in the Far East.

month after our smooth flight acss the American continent to Setle, we were bowling along at eq l speed in the comfortably furnied observation car of a Japanese tra from Tokyo to Shimonoseki. Tlough the broad plate-glass windows w aw the panorama of lovely Japan swping by. At our elbow was an elric button, and at the other end of e wire was an electrically prompt Janese porter, ready to jump to our sece at an instant's notice. It was th-thirty, and the dining-car had ju sent in a tray of tea and cake—a lury unheard of in America. Nearby st a bookcase filled with books and a agazine stand loaded with recent Janese, English and American perioals. In the corner was a writingde equipped with the train's stonery—the de luxest stationery l er saw on a train, heavily embossed wi a picture of Mount Fuji and the nae of the flyer in Japanese characs.

hat observation car would have do credit to any railroad in the wd. A Japanese fellow passenger, an fficial in the Japanese Ministry of C nunications, was amused at our ex essions of delight.

)f course this is all very recent," he xplained. "Five years ago we had noing like this. Forty-five years ago there was not a sie car nor a single mile of track in the whole of Jan. Why," he laughed, "I can remember the fir jerky little trains that were run on the first line to opened—the one between Tokyo and Yokohama. Gls was a new thing to the Japanese, and there were a great many windows broken and heads bumped during those first few weeks. Passengers persisted in trying to put out their heads without first raising the windows. Finally the glass-smashing became so expensive, and there were so many complaints over bruised and cut heads, that the company was forced to paint a white bar on every window to teach passengers the nature of glass."

Which story we could appreciate, for we had already noticed, in the corner of a railroad yard, a little old car with white bars painted across the windows. Some of these cars, our companion told us, are still used as third-class conveyances on newly opened branch lines—for there are still parts of Japan where the people do not quite understand glass.

Proud of her Manchu head-dress, this lady of Mukden, Manchuria, is not asking if the motorman conductor is or is not smoking an American cigarette

THE official went on to tell us what his own and other departments of the government were doing to make Japan comfortable—how in the last ten years the number of electric cars in the empire had jumped from three hundred to four thousand, the number of electric lights had been multiplied twenty times, the number of postal articles carried had been doubled, the mileage of telegraph wire had been increased seventy-five per cent. All this in ten years! Thirty years ago, he continued, there was not a telephone in all Japan. Now there are two hundred thousand instruments, and five hundred thousand miles of telephone wire. You may now slip into an automatic telephone booth in Tokyo and chat with your friend in Nagasaki at the tail end of Japan, seven hundred miles away. Of, if you, on shore, wish to talk to your friend on a steamer twenty miles or so out to sea, you may do so by means of the radio-telephone apparatus recently perfected by three Japanese government engineers!

"Of course we are still far behind America and Europe in matters of comfort," concluded the official, with what seemed to us quite unnecessary modesty.

When the sun had fallen low enough to be eclipsed every now and then by the crests of intervening hills, a boy entered and politely bowed a printed slip to each passenger. On the slip, in both Japanese and English, was the happy legend, "Dinner is ready!"

We passed into the diner. Now, it was certainly not so good as an American diner. But for infant Japan it was wonderful. Perfume of flowers, sheen of electric lights, glint of cut glass, the satisfaction of having an electric bell at each table to make neck-craning unnecessary, the promptness of waiters, the smoothness and dispatch with which dinner was served, the excellence of the dinner itself——

"It's too good to last," was our only fly in the ointment. "Of course Japan is modernized. But when we get to Korea and China——"

WE crossed to Korea on a splendid three-decked, two-thousand-ton steamer. Our stateroom was easily twice as large and twice as pleasant as the stateroom we had occupied on our ship across the Pacific. The voyage took one night.

Next morning we disembarked at Fusan, Korea, "land of the morning calm," and boarded, not a wheelbarrow nor a cart, but a train beside which the Japanese trains were poor and cheap. The railroads of Japan are narrow-gauge, owing to a mistake in the early days of railroad building. The railroads of Korea are broad-gauge, like those of America. If the trains of Japan are fine, those of Korea are finer. The car in which we rode was the equal of any in America. For the matter of that, it was an American car. A Baldwin locomotive, built in Philadelphia, whisked us through the green hills and past the quaint thousand-year-old villages of Korea. It was odd to see the white-swaddled Koreans, with their bare feet and fly-trap hats, riding in this most modern of trains. We fled at forty miles an hour over trails where, a few years ago, these same Koreans doubtless joggled donkey-back at twenty miles a day.

Any American road would have been proud of the dinner on that train. It was vastly better than the dinners on the roads in Japan. The tiffin (luncheon) was table d'hote and cost only one yen (fifty cents). It comprised seven courses, and its main features, relieved of their French disguises, were soup, fish, chicken salad, beefsteak, brown potatoes, succotash, ice cream and lady fingers, apples, oranges, bananas and coffee. Plenty of everything and everything good. Electric bell at every table. Speedy service. Eternal politeness.

And as if this were not enough, ice cream and nabiscos were served at three P.M.! That was the last straw.

At Seoul we stepped off that train, better and wiser people. But wonders were not at an end. The train boy (that Jack of all comforts who does everything within human power to make your train trip easy and agreeable) lifted our suitcases from the train, a porter hurried them out of the station, a chauffeur bundled them and us into a six-cylinder motor-car and whirled us through the streets of Seoul to the entrance of the finest hotel in the Far East. And this best hotel of the East does not stand in some great Europeanized port like Yokohama or Shanghai, Hongkong or Manila. It stands in the heart of the Hermit Land of Korea.

We looked about the great beautiful, vacant lobbies and corridors, and then we glanced over the register.

"You do not have many guests," we commented.

"No," replied the clerk. "We have only been open a few months and tourists don't know about us yet. But even with full tourist trade we don't expect to make the Chosen Hotel a paying investment."

We looked our astonishment.

"The government railways," he explained, "built the hotel as a magnificent advertisement to attract tourists to Korea, a country which they have formerly passed by."

SPECIFICATIONS? Here they are: We were met at the station by a motor car and whisked to our floor in an Otis elevator. We were ushered into the most homelike, least hotelish room I have ever seen in a hotel. A symphony of delicate colors, evidently schemed out by an artist, not by the typical hotel manager. Softly shaded electric lights. Furniture that would have looked appropriate in a Fifth Avenue residence. Eighty such rooms in the hotel, and not a room without a private bath in connection. We stood in the door of our bathroom and gasped. Cunning, comfort-making bath inventions we had never seen before dawning upon us for the first time here in the heart of Korea! And spotless—everything spotless.

Now the Japanese government is paying me nothing to crack up their Chosen Hotel—so come downstairs with me for a moment, and believe me when I say that, except for the Waldorf and the Astor, I have never seen a more beautiful set of public rooms in any hotel than in this "magnificent advertisement" for Korea. The banquet hall was a cathedral. The huge reception room babbled with fountains and the walls were decorated with exquisite paintings of Korean scenes done by a Japanese artist educated in Paris. The drawing room was a perfect sunset in soft pink and gold. My wife camped almost permanently on the mahogany seat before the big Steinway. The game room was as big as a park, and the reading-room contained every important American magazine, as well as periodicals from all the rest of the world.

After rolling about Seoul in comfortable pneumatic-tired rickshas invented by an American missionary, riding on a trolley line built by an American, dropping our fares into an American-made register, and worn on the belt of a quaint Korean conductor, after spinning twenty miles out into the country in an American motorcycle over a boulevard constructed by an American—after all these sumptuous surprises in little-known Korea, we went on, with questioning minds, to China.

The author does not explain the zigzag track on this Japanese railway station platform, but the rest of the picture speaks for itself

CHINA did not lag behind Korea and Japan. Through Antung, Mukden and Tientsin, we went to Peking. The hotels everywhere were good. The character of the railroad run by the French from Peking to Hankow was a new surprise. The cars were of the compartment variety. Instead of the stuffy, cramped berths of an American Pullman, we had a large double stateroom to ourselves. When the door was closed, we were practically in our own private car. That stateroom contained four berths, two of which could be used as lounges, two large windows, a table, electric lights, an electric fan, and an electric bell with which to call our sprucely - uniformed Chinese porter.

Get your morning pap, Mister!

The diner was excellent. The price of meals was about half what one would pay o an American diner. Our ticket cost substantially ess than the price of American Pullman accommoda ons for the same distance. Few stops, good roadbed, tle smoke, every courtesy and every comfort. Anc his in the interior of China.

Less than one hundred d ars was paid for the first locom ive in China. It weighed twent wo hundredweight. The rails ere about the size of walking- ks and lay thirty inches apart. ne day, after the seven-mile lin ad been operating only a few mo hs, a trespasser was run ove nd killed by the little engine. he rails were promptly torn up nd shipped to Formosa to rust. hus ending the fate of the first ra oad in China.

That was only forty year go. Now China has more than six ou-sand miles of railway, with ne revenue of more than eight n ion dollars a year. And C. C. ang of the government railway beau stands sponsor for this proph :

"It is no exaggeration to say that there will be more rai ays built in China during the c ing twenty-five years than in a the rest of the world combined."

We lived for a while in a K ean home, eating Korean rice, p les and seaweed, padding abc in stocking feet, sitting on our els in lieu of chairs, sleeping on one floors with our heads resting on the customary pine blocks which the Koreans ich prefer to pillows. But we had these experience nly when we deliberately sought them. The Ori is the Orient de luxe to those who wish it so.

An American motorcycle is as interesting to these Korean children as they themselves are to us

Step lively, gentlemen of Korea, for these cars were made in Wilmington, Del., U. S. A.

True and False Patriotism

An Independence Day Sermon

By REV. CHARLES EDWARD JEFFERSON, D.D.*

EXT—Ps. 147 : 20. “He hath not dealt so with any nation.”

WHAT is patriotism? Love of country. Is it good or bad? Tolstoy said it is bad. These are his words: “In our day, the feeling of patriotism is an unnatural, irr ional and harmful feeling, and a cause of a great pa of the ills from which mankind is suffering. Th feeling should not be cultivated, but should be suppressed, and eradicated by all means available to ational men.” Tolstoy was led to feel thus because he had been all his life face to face with perverted forms of patriotism. He had seen so much bad patriot m that he refused at last to believe that patriotis can ever be good.

this the great Russian was mistaken. He assumed that if a man is patriotic, he must believe his own country is superior to all others, and if the citizens of every state think this of their own state, th all live in a gross and harmful delusion. But th is reading into patriotism something which does no belong there. To be patriotic it is not necessary to believe that one's own country is superior to all ot rs, nor is it necessary to wish his country to get th greatest advantages and power at the expense of the advantages and power of other peoples or states. This is a form of patriotism, however, exce ingly common, and it behooves us to be on our gu d against it.

atriotism is sometimes nothing but a vainglorious feeling of superiority to foreign nations. At other times it is a fear of them. Again it is hatred of them. But all these feelings are patriotism in a degraded form. Patriotism is an instinct, and like all other instincts, it can be perverted. It is an emotion, and like all other emotions, it can become morbid. It is a ssion, and like all other passions, it can become diseased and dangerous. It is a virtue, and like all ot r virtues, it can be pushed too far, passing into a e.

here lived once in France a soldier, Nicholas Ch vin, who was so demonstrative in his patriotic fervor that he made a fool of himself, and ever since his day a man who displays a cocky and hysterical patriotism is called a chauvinist. In England such a man is called a jingo. A jingo is always bragging about his country's preparedness to fight. In Germany this form of patriotism is known as Pangermanism. in Russia it is called Panslavism, and in the U ed States it is labeled “spreadeagleism.” The on patriotism which some men seem capable of ex iting is a contempt for other nations and a glorific ion of their own. Let us agree that all such patriot n is dangerous, as well as silly; and let us face the pr lem of cultivating in the American people a patriotism which is rational and Christian.

PATRIOTISM is a genuine love of one's native land. When one truly loves his country, he is proud of its history, loyal to its ideals, and jealous for its future. It is not necessary for one to think that his country is superior to all others. It is enough to think that it is a good country, and to know that it is de er to his heart than any other. It is not necessary for a patriot to wish that his country shall prosper at the cost of its neighbors; it is enough to wish that all the nations shall prosper through mutual regard for one another's rights and liberties. The possible pe ersions of patriotism and the havoc which these pe ersions are likely to work make it necessary that all who are interested in human progress should po er carefully the nature of patriotism and endeavor to ant the right idea of love of country in the hearts of the rising generation.

rtain questions at once suggest themselves. When Stephen Decatur a hundred years ago said: “Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong,” what did he mean? It is certainly true that our country is still ours, no matter what our governmental officials do, and that we are still bound to love our country even when it is misguided, and to serve it in every way open to us; but we are under no obligation to justify our government when, in our judgment, it has entered upon a course which is wrong. We certainly could not endorse a policy which in our view was immoral. We could not stand up for a wrong, an injustice, a robbery, a cruelty. A citizen owes it to his country to protest against every false policy which the government in power may adopt; and he can show his love in no more effective way than by lifting up his voice against what he believes to be for the damage of his own nation and the higher interests of the world. Carl Schurz was right when he said: “My country, right or wrong, is a maxim as immoral as to say ‘Myself, right or wrong.’” When the majority of the citizens of a nation are willing to back up a set of officials in everything, no matter how atrocious, upon which these officials may agree, then that nation becomes a nuisance and a menace to the well-being of the world.

IT is sometimes said that an American must put “America First,” and keep her first all the time. This may be true and it may be false. There is a sense in which a man's own family must be first. He owes to it an allegiance which takes precedence over the allegiances owed to other families. A man's own country stands above other countries in his thoughts and feelings; but it does not follow that his country shall be pushed to the front by shoving other nations aside. When Madame de Staël said that the patriotism of nations ought to be selfish, she was subscribing to the doctrine of Machiavelli, the man who has done more to debauch European diplomacy than any other man who ever lived. There are cultivated pagans in every country, ready to subscribe to this atrocious doctrine. Selfishness is a sin wherever it is practiced, and the sin is all the more heinous and fatal when it is committed in the realm of international diplomacy. The correct maxim is “Humanity first!” The nation which adopts for its motto “Myself first!” breaks a fundamental law of the Eternal, and the world must reap a harvest of blood and tears.

THERE is a patriotism which takes delight in flourishing a gun. Many men never glow with patriotic fervor until they think of military drill, and the glory of a battlefield. Everything connected with military equipment is to them patriotic; soldiers are preeminently patriots; their patriotism is of a superior brand; they are the saviors of their country; upon them as upon no others the nation depends. This also is a pernicious doctrine. Men with guns are not necessarily a whit more patriotic than any other class of citizens. It is not true that soldiers alone can save a country. The present war in Europe has demonstrated that the cooperation of every class of workers is essential to the successful prosecution of a war. The coal-miners are not inferior in importance to the men who fire the guns. A man is not then a superior patriot simply because he makes patriotic speeches, in which he exploits the army and the navy and says fulsome things about the flag. There are many men who still grow enthusiastic in resisting the tyranny of George III, who seem to take no interest in resisting the tyrants which threaten the country today; and it is far easier to glow with indignation against the men who, over fifty years ago, tried to destroy the Union, than to resist with resolute determination those combinations which in our day jeopardize the stability of the Republic.

Patriotism is something more than brandishing a gun or waving a flag. It is standing up for the principles of democracy wherever and whenever those principles are attacked. It is defending the principle of equality against the inroads of a new set of enemies far more dangerous than any which have preceded them. It is working, in season and out of season, for the establishment of the principle of brotherhood in all the kingdoms of our national life. The poet Horace once wrote that it is beautiful to die for one's country. The time has come when it is far more beautiful to live for one's country. To live is often harder than to die. To face the laughter and jeers of influential people often demands a higher grade of courage than to face the guns on the battlefield. “Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war,” as Milton long ago declared, and the patriotism which our nation is most in need of is not the patriotism which shivers at the thought of foreign invasion, but the patriotism which is willing to make sacrifices in order that our civic and industrial and social life may be put on sounder foundations. If a man loves his country he should show it by ministering to its most urgent needs.

We Americans have just ground for being proud of our country. The size of it is enough to make the heart beat. How big and varied and beautiful it is! What rivers, lakes, mountains, prairies, forests, plains! What variety of beauty, what range of climate and soil, and what manifoldness of natural resources! Where is there a country surpassing us?

BUT it is not its bigness which should give us our deepest joy. It is its greatness. Bigness is an attribute of matter, but greatness is an attribute of mind. Our country is great. Our men have made it great. We have given the world the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and we have furnished a model which shows how forty-eight commonwealths can be compacted into a harmonious and mighty nation. We have given the world invaluable lessons in the work of public education, and have demonstrated that it is possible to have a church without a bishop, and a state without a king. The whole world is our debtor. From the beginning we have been a world power, influencing the political life of many lands. They who date the birth of our world power only eighteen years back do not understand what has happened in the world since the days of Washington. And, best of all, we have kept our doors open, and have allowed the multitudes from many lands to come in, showing a hospitality and a generosity without a parallel in the whole history of the world. The history of America reads like a romance. There are pages which sound like an epic poem. Who can read the immortal story without exclaiming in the words of a Hebrew prophet: “He has not dealt so with any people!”

THIS is a good time for us to think about our country. The great war gives us the spectacle of millions of men marching forth to suffer and to die for their country. Who can look upon such a sight without thinking of his own country, and asking himself: “What am I willing to do for it?” We Americans do not think as often of our country as we ought to think. We are too busy, and too prone to criticize. It is easier to find fault than to work to eradicate the imperfections of which we complain. We should study our history with greater zeal, and fix more firmly in our mind our national ideal, and read more often the speeches of our greatest statesmen and the poems of our greatest poets, and give our hearts more fully to the work of making it impossible for government of the people, for the people and by the people to perish from the earth.

“My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.”

YUAN'S DEATH ENDS REBELLION. Vice-president Li Yuan Hung, who before his succession to the presidency had been elected president of the southern republic, is reported in Peking dispatches of June 9 to have been accepted as president by all of China. The northern provinces promptly declared their loyalty to the government. The four southern provinces in rebellion, Szechuen, Hunan, Chekiang, and Shensi, rescinded their declarations of independence and reasserted their loyalty to the Peking government.

IOWA REJECTS SUFFRAGE. At a primary election on June 5, the state of Iowa rejected woman suffrage by the small majority of about 4,000 votes.

STRIKING A HIGH NOTE. At its recent annual convention in New York City, the Music Publishers' Association of the United States agreed that the retail prices of printed music were too low, and decided to increase the net prices.

THE POPE BARS DANCING. The Vatican Consistory has made a ruling which places a ban on dancing at all entertainments given under the auspices of Roman Catholic churches.

WEDDED FOR CONQUEST. During the week of June 7-14 the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions held its annual conference in New York with one hundred missionaries in attendance, seventy of whom were newly appointed missionaries preparing for their first assault upon the darkness of heathenism. Of the seventy, fourteen were recently married, and nine couples will wed within the next few weeks. The mission board prefers to send out married missionaries in order that they may add to their other service the example of a Christian home, which is not the least potent of evangelistic influences.

RECORD EXPORTS. Exports from the port of New York for the month of April reached a total value of $187,886,733, as against $135,927,031 in March. Of this total, $83,329,522 represented exports wholly or in part intended for the use of the armies in Europe.

PANAMA CANAL IN USE. In the first month following the reopening of the canal, from April 15 to May 14 inclusive, 137 ocean-going ships made the trip through the canal. The greatest number of ships using the canal in any one month has been 170, and the average per month during the previous operation of the canal before the slides was 116¼. The excavation from the bases of the slides continues, upwards of 250,000 cubic yards of earth and rock being handled by the dredges each week. The aggregate of excavation at the bases of the slides since October 14, 1914, has been 13,952,559 cubic yards, and the slides are still sliding, although the dredges gain slowly.

NEW YORK MAY LOSE SUNDAY. The committee which has been arranging for the evangelistic campaign which was to have been started by Rev. William A. Sunday January 1, 1917, has found it impossible to secure a suitable site for the tabernacle which Mr. Sunday insists must be erected. On June 12 it was announced that unless something unexpected turned up, plans for a campaign in 1917 would have to be given up.

EXPLOSION KILLS FOUR. An explosion of dust in an elevator in Baltimore harbor, on June 13, caused a fire in which the elevator was destroyed and two steamships loading grain were badly damaged. Four men were fatally burned. Thirty-four stevedores imprisoned in the hold of one of the vessels fought their way to the deck over piles of grain and were rescued by launches. Property loss was in the neighborhood of $2,000,000.

THREAT OF RAILWAY STRIKE PERSISTS. The conference begun on June 1 in New York between representatives of the railways of the United States and their men resulted in an exchange of views but no agreement. The railways insisted upon certain modifications in the rules without granting the demand of the men for an eight-hour day; while the men persisted in the demand for the shorter day and refused to consider the suggested changes in the rules. It is expected that the conference will reconvene after the result has been reported to the unions and their representatives have received authority to call a strike in case an agreement cannot be reached. Chambers of commerce in the United States are working to bring the two parties to the controversy together. Congress may direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation at once, and the railways and their men will then be asked to defer pending controversies until the commission has made its report.

WEST POINT GRADUATES RECEIVE DIPLOMAS FROM PRESIDENT WILSON, JUNE 13. In his address to the class President Wilson said: "Militarism is a spirit. It is a point of view. It is a system. It is a purpose. The purpose of militarism is to use armies for aggression. The spirit of militarism is the opposite of the civilian spirit—the citizen spirit. In a country where militarism prevails, the military man looks down upon the civilian, regards him as inferior, thinks of him as intended for his, the military man's, support and use; and just so long as America is America, that spirit and point of view is impossible with us. There is as yet in this country, so far as I can discover, no taint of the spirit of militarism."

GARMENT WORKERS STILL STRIKE. Garment workers of New York City, sixty thousand of whom have been on strike for more than a month, have remained on strike with few defections from their ranks in spite of the opening of the shops by the employers. Attempts by various authorities to intervene in the strike have brought no results. Sixty-eight garment shops were reported to have been started outside of New York, but the announcement failed to stampede the strikers into the shops. Employers of about one-third of the strikers are reported in favor of arbitration. The majority of the employers sill hold out for a complete victory over the union.

THE GREAT NORTHWEST. On June 13 Mr. Louis W. Hill was elected to succeed his father, James J. Hill, as a director of the First National Bank of New York. In speaking of the territory served by the Great Northern, Mr. Hill said that the opportunities for development and expansion were still very great. He said the Great Northern was pushing new lines to serve undeveloped sections; and that land is already worth twenty dollars an acre in the country toward which the lines are building. Settlers are coming in rapidly. Towns are springing up over night. He reported the crop outlook as fine, which carries with it an assurance of continued business activity.

MORE THRILLERS FOR THE ZOO. Arthur de C. Sowerby, who has been securing zoological specimens for the National Museum in China and Manchuria, reports the finding of a series of squirrels of a new species, like chipmunks, but having a thick, soft and much more grayish fur, and no cheek pouches. They live in holes in oak trees and are very active, taking enormous leaps from one tree to another. In southern Shensi, Mr. Sowerby secured an enormous bull takin, a large goat-like animal peculiar to that region, and a female specimen of the rare C hese musk deer, besides a number of s ller mammals.

NEW YORK WILL GRADE RE AURANTS. It was announced durin the last week of May that the Healt Department of the City of New ork would inspect every hotel and resta ant in the city and determine the sa ary conditions and the methods der which food is prepared and served the public. The inspection was to i ude the places for storage of foodstuf and the cleanliness of cooks, waiter and assistants. Entire Militia Called to Arms

ON Sunday, June 18, President Wilson called out the state militia of practically the entire country for mobilization on the Mexican border, as a precautionary measure. Forty-four Governors were notified by telegraph by Newt D. Baker, Secretary of War, that the call was necessary "in view of the possibility of further aggression upon the territory of the United States." This first use of the newly created Federal power to make use of state militia as an active arm of the regular army is expected to produce 1,000 men out of a minimum militia strength of 134,000. For the time being the state troops are to be distributed in such manner as to strengthen the present patrol on the border, and to release units of the regular army for use in Mexico if that becomes necessary. Besides the 10,000 American soldiers now under General Pershing in Chihuahua, with headquarters at Namiquipa, approximately 30,000 regular troops will then be available to General Funston, who is in command of Mexican operations, practically the entire mobile regular army in the continental United States, besides 5,000 members of the National Guard of Texas, New Mexico and Arizona, now at the border or in Mexico.

Monday morning, June 19, saw the militia in motion. Governors in all cases have been prompt to respond to the President's call and to assure him of the fullest measure of cooperation. Orders reached the officers in the respective states by telegraph, and the first steps toward mobilization were immediately begun.

At the same time that the call was being issued to the militia, Secretary of the Navy Daniels ordered additional warships to both coasts of Mexico. At present, battleships of one character or another are stationed at Vera Cruz, Tampico, El Carmen on the east coast; and on the west coast at Guaymas, Manzanillo, and Mazatlan.

The announcement of Secretary of War Baker is given in the press as follows:

"In view of the disturbed conditions on the Mexican border, and in order to assure complete protection for all Americans, the President has called out substantially all the State militia, and will send them to the border wherever and as fully as General Funston determines them to be needed for the purpose stated.

"If all are not needed, an effort will be made to relieve those on duty there from time to time, so as to distribute the duty.

"This call for militia is wholly unrelated to General Pershing's expedition, and contemplates no additional entry into Mexico, except as may be necessary to pursue bandits who attempt outrages on American soil.

"The militia are being called out so as to leave some troops in the several States. They will be mobilized at their home stations, where necessary recruiting can be done."

It is expected that the entire force of the National Guard of the country will be under arms and in motion toward the border (if ordered to proceed) within three days at the most from the issuance of the call.

It is reported that panic is seizing Americans now in Mexico, especially in the state of Sonora, and that hostile demonstrations made to terrorize American residents are of daily occurrence. Americans are leaving Mexico as rapidly as possible, but in many cases are refused the use of the trains, according to the reports.

While it is hoped that this demonstration will have a salutary effect upon the belligerent spirits in Mexico, nevertheless the possibility of actual intervention comes nearer with this move. The troop of cavalry which crossed the Rio Grande from Brownsville, Texas, in pursuit of the bandits who recently raided Texas ranches and attacked American troops east of San Benito, has returned to the American side. Such incidents have greatly increased the tension at the border, and it is reported that the arming of Mexican civilians, even including women, is going feverishly forward.

question of preparedness, and incidentally to cast a few gauntlets of its own upon the course. The program of the convention had been carefully worked out in advance by the President and the National Committee. It was reported that the platform had been drafted by the President himself, and that the program of the convention was to be hung upon the slogan "Peace, Prosperity and Preparedness," while the true note of Americanism was to be maintained throughout the sessions.

On the subject of foreign relations, after reciting the turbulent conditions of the world and calling attention to the President's maintenance of peace under great provocations, the platform declared the policy of this government to be honorable neutrality as between belligerents; then insisting upon the observance by belligerents of the rights of the government of the United States and its people and a readiness at all times to offer a sincere and friendly service in any acceptable way to the nations at war to bring about peace. The paragraph closes: "Without claiming that no mistakes have been made, we submit to the candid judgment of the people that so far the President has steered our ship of state through troubled waters with a remarkable clearness of vision and steadiness of hand." The platform declares for the protection of our rights in Mexico and indicates that the President intends to take a much more rigorous attitude toward Mexico immediately. The plank on Americanism denounces foreign-born citizens who conspire to influence the policies of the United States, denounces any political party which seeks to take advantage of foreign influences, and expresses the confidence of the party in the undivided loyalty of the great majority of naturalized citizens. The platform contains a strong expression for adequate preparedness, and in addition to the usual declaration for a tariff for revenue only, there is a demand for legislation which will protect American industry against the dumping of foreign products in this market at the close of the war. The convention was called to order by Chairman William F. McCombs of the Democratic National Committee, who introduced ex-Governor Martin H. Glynn of New York, the temporary chairman, who was to strike the keynote of the convention. His speech had been carefully prepared and as carefully considered by the President and the leaders of the Democracy. Mr. Glynn aroused the greatest enthusiasm by citing a long chain of historical precedents to prove that negotiation, instead of war, has been the almost unbroken policy of the United States ever since the foundation of the republic. "Save where the liberties, the territory, or the substantial rights of the United States are invaded and assaulted," he said, "it is the duty of this nation to avoid war by every honorable means. The policy of neutrality is as truly American as the American flag—a policy fixed in the nation's traditions.

> "Wealth has come to us, power has come to us; better than wealth or power, we have maintained for ourselves and for our children a nation dedicated to the ideals of peace rather than to the gospel of selfishness and slaughter." He told how the Spaniards had shot the crew of the Virginius, but we had not gone to war over it; how the Chileans had killed and wounded seventeen of our sailors, but without a resulting war; how foreign countries had violated our rights in the Civil War; how Confederate sympathizers from Canada had raided Vermont; how the Alabama had devastated our commerce, all without war. In Pierce's administration, Great Britain violated our neutrality, but there was no war; when Van Buren was President, Canadians attacked an American ship, killed some of her crew, and sent her adrift over Niagara Falls, all without war. France extended her seizures, searches, and confiscations to the very waters of the United States themselves. American ambassadors who sought to adjust these wrongs were refused recognition and openly insulted at the French court. We did not go to war. In Washington's administration our ships dared not put out to sea; American crews and passengers were thrown into prison and deprived of legal rights. No war followed. No one will brand Grant as a coward because he kept us at peace with Spain. The genius of our country is for peace. We have built our greatness on the resources of nature and the peaceful toil of our people. The ring of the anvil, not the rattle of the saber; the song of the reaper, not the shock of the soldier; the clatter of the shuttle, not the crack of the rifle, have won us the place we occupy today in the councils of the world.

This part of Mr. Glynn's speech had been written as an answer to the Republican characterization of the Wilson foreign policies as weak and vacillating. It was not the peroration, but the convention grasped it as the true declaration of its faith and rose as one man to cheer the orator and his message. They forced Mr. Glynn to repeat sentence after sentence, and the chosen keynote of the convention became greatly imperiled by the new slogan, "We did not go to war."

The convention organized permanently on Thursday morning with Senator Ollie James in the chair, and he again brought the convention to its feet when he declared, "There are two kinds of courage, the courage of the man who is willing to go into the conflict himself, and the courage of the man who is willing to send others there." But the big hit of the convention came when Mr. James said, "Without orphaning a single American child, without widowing a single American mother, without shedding a drop of blood, he (President Wilson) wrung from the most militant spirit that ever brooded above a battlefield the concession of American demands and American rights."

At the request of the convention Mr. Bryan, who, though not a delegate, was present as a representative of the press, was escorted to the platform and addressed the delegates, declaring himself for peace and for Mr. Wilson. He praised Mr. Wilson for his success in keeping the nation out of war and for his constructive legislation, notably the Underwood Tariff Act and the Federal Reserve Act.

There was no controversy as to the head of the ticket, the convention being unanimous for the renomination of Mr. Wilson, who was nominated at midnight of Thursday, June 15, and the nomination of Mr. Marshall followed. There was some talk of a contest for the second position on the ticket, but the plans of the President and his advisers to renominate the ticket of 1912 were never seriously endangered, and the Democracy presents to the nation in 1916—Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey for President, and Thomas R. Marshall of Indiana for Vice-President.

ANOTHER RAID FROM MEXICO. A band of about one hundred Mexicans, whether Villistas or Carranzistas it is not known, raided American territory near the little settlement of San Ignacio, Texas, early on the morning of June 15. Troop M of the U. S. Fourteenth Cavalry was first attacked. Troop I, encamped a short distance away, immediately came to the relief of Troop M, the two troops outnumbering the assailants, whom they drove off after thirty minutes' fighting, in which three American soldiers were killed and six wounded. Eight Mexicans were killed, a number captured, and forty-two horses were taken. The troops in action were under the command of Major Alonzo Gray, who immediately began arrangements for following the trail of the fleeing bandits into Mexico. That part of Mexico across the river from San Ignacio is heavily garrisoned with Carranza troops. On June 9 a detachment of General Pershing's forces surprised a remnant of the band of Candelario Cervantes. Three bandits were killed and twenty-four horses were captured; no Americans were injured. General Pershing is still cleaning up the territory policed by his troops and is building military roads. The Mexican press is

The Next Four Months

PERHAPS there is no single event decreed on the calendar which gives the average business American so much trouble and anxiety as a tumultuous presidential campaign. However ardent his patriotism and earnest his desire to "help save the country," he instinctively wilts after the national conventions have finished their work and political forces line up for the four months' hubbub, which means to him months of disturbance and uncertainty in business that he would gladly be spared.

And now we are again looking forward to the old familiar experiences, the big picturesque parades, the bands and the torchlights, the spell-binders and the flood of variegated oratory which we are compelled to endure in every presidential election; but this year things are different, and it might be well to try to be sensible and serious by way of a change. The campaign now opening is one of momentous issue. Our people have been stirred to the heart by the problems that have sprung out of the great war. They know that it is not a time for flamboyant spreadeagleism. They have a right to expect that the campaign shall be conducted on sane and dignified lines, for the world is looking on, and America in the next four months will be judged largely by its public utterances. What we may say of neutrality, of international good-will, of peace, and of humanity will be duly noted. Jingoism and saber-rattling and fantastic appeals for "preparedness" will be out of place at a time when we ought to keep steadily in view the great rôle we may be called upon to play in the international drama, when the climax comes.

Let us then act in these next months as a people with a vision of world helpfulness. Let our acts and our speech be such as will harmonize with the bigness and importance of the occasion.

Twenty-two Genuine Churches

SEVENTY-FIVE dollars per member for missions and other benevolences; six dollars and sixty-six cents per member for the work of the local church itself. This is the splendid record of St. Luke's Reformed Church, of Trappe, Pa. The Laymen's Missionary Movement publish a table of twenty-one other churches of this same denomination, the Reformed Church in the United States, which achieved the noble distinction during this last church year of giving more for outside purposes than for their own local work. Not all of them are large churches. Four have less than two hundred members; one less than one hundred.

These twenty-two congregations should be loudly praised for what they have done. But there ought to be twenty-two thousand, or two hundred and twenty thousand, such churches instead of only twenty-two. Every church ought to be that kind of a church. That is Christianity—to give. There is no more excuse for a congregation being selfish than for an individual Christian to be selfish. A local church does not exist for itself, but for the community, the denomination, the nation, and the world.

A man buys food so he can work; not merely for the sake of buying food. The church that spends all its strength feeding itself, merely keeping up its own strength, is just as much one out of order, just as far from being a success, as the man who does no more than this. That is the reason many churches have poor spiritual health, just as it is the reason many people have poor physical health. The unselfish, energetic, objective life is the healthful life.

The church whose lines are gone out into all the world is a happy, healthy church. A church whose Sunday school classes get letters from boys and girls in heathen lands whom the classes are supporting; the church that has a missionary representative on the foreign field; the church that has a hand in matters of community, state and national reform; the church that cares for and builds up and saves others; that sends out the new converts to win others; that uses its money to establish and build and help other churches—that church is a church after the heart of Christ.

Forcing Up Prices

EFFORTS to investigate the arbitrary rise in staple commodities are meeting with poor success. The Federal Trade Commission, which has been investigating the rapid rise in gasoline, has had before it a number of representatives of the great refining companies outside of the Standard Oil group, all of whom testified that they could not determine the cost of motor fuel manufacture. Prices were fixed by Standard Oil and they had no choice but to adopt them. Some witnesses told of apprehensions of a shortage in gasoline as one of the principal reasons for the rise, while others were satisfied that there would soon be an overproduction and a resultant drop in prices. One witness said the upward tendency was completely under the control of conditions in the oil market and exonerated the Standard. The evidence on the whole was baffling and contradictory, throwing no light on the problem.

Somewhat similar conditions surround the operations of the Beef Trust, which has steadily forced up the price of meat to the retailers for the past two years. At the Convention of the New York State Association of United Master Butchers of America, held in Syracuse a few days ago, a petition was forwarded to President Wilson in Washington, urging an investigation into the increase of meat prices, which the petitioners declared had been forced up half a cent a pound per week—an increase which they pronounced altogether unwarranted.

It is due to the people, who are the ultimate victims of these arbitrary manipulations of commodity prices, that the inquiry in both instances should be thorough and searching. Any combinations to profit by the necessities of consumers can be made amenable to law and severely punished. If the facts in these two instances are such as the evidence would seem to indicate, the investigators should use the necessary means to compel a full disclosure and apply the proper remedy. Government must find a way to protect the people from being plundered and exploited.

The Spirit of Independence Day

AMERICA, Mother of Liberty, thy sons, on this thy natal day, unfurl the colors of fidelity and greet thee with the utmost measure of their love. Such sons are thine as none has known before. Freedom called; and from the old world lands, from tyranny of king, of conscience, race or hopeless struggle, came those proud souls who dared to hope, who would not yield to circumstance nor cringe before the common fate. Puritan and Huguenot, Quaker and Burgher, Celt and Briton, Teuton, Slav and Jew, all these have come. Leaving behind the lands that gave them birth, they pledged their faith, their lives, to Liberty, to Equality before the law, to opportunity alike for all, to thee, America! And pledging thus, some have even sealed with blood their pledge; and some have died, that government of the people, by the people, should not perish from the earth.

THUS, through one hundred and forty years, O land of ours, thou hast woven into the fabric of thy citizenship the choicest spirits of the race. The flag—thy flag of stars and glorious stripes—has flown unsullied by unworthy enterprise; its colors still to all the world proclaim the freedom of thy sons. This freedom guard, America. Tyranny of race, tyranny of power, of money or of class has throttled freedom elsewhere in other lands. Beware of these, but more beware the tyranny of fear—that thing which for a century has burdened Europe, till the fear was realized in awful struggle.

AMERICA, Mother of Liberty, guard well the heritage of thy sons.

Alice Gets Her Name in the Paper

A LITTLE girl died in Brooklyn the other day. Many little girls die in Brooklyn every week, but most of them do not get their names in the paper. The newspapers charge money for putting the names of people who die into the column of death notices, and the fathers and mothers of most of the little girls who die in greater New York do not have any spare money to spend for space in the obituary columns.

But Alice Nessel, who died the other day near the corner of Hinsdale Street and Glenmore Avenue, in that section of Brooklyn known as East New York, got her name in the paper. Not merely in the obituary column, but on the front page.

How did it happen?

It happened because Alice's mother not only did not have enough money to print a newspaper notice of her death, but did not have enough to get ice decently buried. They were planning to let her tle body be taken to the "Potter's Field," a place ere people are buried whose friends have not e igh money to pay for a regular burial, when the neig ors heard of it and raised money to prevent it. me friend heard of the situation and put a plate in ont of Alice's house, into which sympathetic neig ors dropped the pennies and nickels that were to ave her from a pauper's grave.

But the matter is still unexplained. Wh did these neighbors care so much that Alice shou be saved the disgrace that so many others have to s er? It appears that Alice's mother is sick and tha her father is dead. So Alice had to support the fa ily. She earned five dollars a week at a factory. girl who works in a factory ought to have good, ng. sound sleep at night. But Alice could not rest m at night because she had to take care of her sick m her.

So of course Alice is dead. We must rem ber that she was only fourteen years old.

And her name is in the papers. We are gl to put her name in this paper, too—brave, fa ful, dear, strong, starving, dying little Alice, who uld not live because she had to bear burdens th no child can bear. And we should like to write her me upon the hearts and minds of every man, woma and child in America, so that we may all do som ing real, something quick and definite and positive, d—are we afraid to say radical!—to put an end the things that made her die.

It is too late to save her. But there are thou nds of children who will die like her—children who ght to be kept alive, who could be kept alive if A ica would do its duty. Shall the story of Alice N el's brave life and pitiful death help to make us do it

An American Siberia

WHAT should be done with our crimina opulation, to keep them where they w be rendered incapable of harm and wher hey will cease to be an economic burden on the comm ity, is a problem that is becoming more and more u ent. One journal, the New York American, comes the front with a plan to establish an American S eria on the islands of the Alaskan peninsula, whe our convict population could be colonized, guarded a inst escape, supplied with means of self-support and segregated as to sexes. By such means, it urg the criminal population would gradually dwindl and their exclusion would bring about a great chan for the better in conditions here at home.

Of course, the plan to found a great penal Am can colony, like that of Siberia in Russia, is not a ne one. Such a project need not necessarily imply seve y or inhumanity. In many respects, it would be ferable to present conditions in scores of our p tentiaries and state prisons, with their unwholesom vercrowding and the tendency on the whole to ake bad men worse. With a few shining exceptio our prisons are a disgrace to American civilizati A penal colony, properly conducted on humane y irm principles, possessing the advantage of being re ved from the centers of criminal attraction, and abs tely self-supporting, might be well worth while erimentally. There is a wide difference betwe the brutalities and tortures of Siberia and a c vict colony run on humane and reasonable prin les. Of course, any proposition of the kind would enc nter the full force of official hostility at the outset but the experiment, once in successful operation, ight be the beginning of the end of our present anti ted and altogether undesirable prison system. It ould be interesting to know what our leading crimino gists think of the plan.

From Washington's Farewell Addi ss

THE great rule of conduct for us, in regard to eign nations, is, in extending our commercial relati s, to have with them as little political connection as possib

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to u have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be e aged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are ess ially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be wise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the o nary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinatio and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and ena s us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people der an efficient government, the period is not far off when may defy material injury from external annoyance; when may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we y at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected hen belligerent nations, under the impossibility of maki acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us ovocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our in ests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Wind and Sail

SUNDAY, July 2. Heb. 6 : 1. "Let us go on unto perfection." Such is the Authorized Version of the apostle's words. But a literal translation would be given in this phrase: "et us be borne on unto perfection"; and the diffence is profoundly significant. The one leaves us t much in the nakedness of our own effort: the other iroduces the friendly cooperative might of the enal God. One leaves us faint in endeavor: the oer inspires us with all-sufficient resource. One eages our attention to the oars: the other reminds uof a favorable wind. The one emphasizes works, a the other emphasizes grace. The latter calls us tput ourselves in certain preparatory conditions, a the great trade-winds of God will do the rest. V shall be "borne on unto perfection."

ow, our religious life too frequently dwells in the eier version, and it is lacking in serenity and insation. Our religion becomes an extra piece of bgage which we have to carry, instead of being an era power to make our burden light. It weights uwith impedimenta instead of endowing us with wgs. We are in the atmosphere of commandments, a the beatitudes are ignored. We live in the seve house of the law, when we might live in the riant home of grace. Our statutes do not break ib songs. We give more evidence of struggle than w do of new and glorious fellowship. We do not iress the world as though we had received strange a secret additions to our strength. We are not li a sailing boat which has just been caught in the sep of a friendly wind and is being borne along joyfy to its desired haven.

nd yet it is this evidence of a heavenly trade-wind wch is our most arresting witness for the Lord. V are no good unless we manifest superior resources. ve are just as overdone as the children of the world, j as full of labor in hard rowing, just as easily exhsted, we offer no recommendation for our faith. C witness is to be found in the reality of a mystic crent, in the breath of God, in the power of the ly Spirit. We must make it plain to the world tt there is more wind in our sails, more water in o mill-stream, more engine-power in our machinery. C witness must be in "the demonstration of the pver of the Spirit." And to this end we must lay hl of the passive as well as the active aspects of t apostle's word: we must not only "go on," we nst be "borne on unto perfection." We must be "rengthened in the grace which is in Christ Jesus."

The Mysterious Priest-King of Salem

MONDAY, July 3. Ps. 110 : 1-7. "Thou art a Priest forever." In the King's Dale—a dimple ithe hills that were afterwards to be world-famous aOlivet and Zion—a mysterious figure flits across t page of history. Like an apparition, we know not vence it comes nor whither it goes. In later words, 'aving neither beginning of days, nor end of life." Is the figure of Melchizedek, the mysterious king of Sem, who was also priest of the Most High God. Nighboring tribes witnessed the blue spiral column osacrifice ascending periodically from his altars, al all recognized the outstanding purity and nolty of his character. He was emphatically King cRighteousness. Even the king of Sodom held his pce until Abraham had partaken of Melchizedek's lad and wine and bowed beneath his benediction. Then, for well-nigh two thousand years, no further rerence is made to him, till the psalmist suddenly tches this chord which vibrates with his name.

Again no further reference is made to him till he inentioned in the Epistle to the Hebrews as a consuous type of our Lord, and we are told that he vs made like unto the Son of God, who abideth a lest continually. Clearly, then, our Lord is the sject of this psalm. As he suggested in his last plic address, he only is David's Son and Lord. He s at the Father's right hand, waiting till his foes a made his footstool. The day of his power was tt in which he received of the Father the Holy Srit, and shed him on his waiting church. His fowers are clad in the beauties of holiness, and refsh the parched earth as the dew. But emphaticay in him the priesthood and the kingship blend in pfect union, according to the ancient prediction—'e shall be a priest upon his throne." But his pesthood, unlike Aaron's, is not limited by time. It has the note of Eternity. Seventeen times the Epistle to the Hebrews insists that this priesthood is perennial, timeless, "forever." In this far-off glade of time, it is for us.

Unspoken Falsehoods

TUESDAY, July 4. Acts 5 : 3. "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Spirit?" There are two kinds of lies, spoken and acted. Ananias acted a lie sinning against the Holy Spirit. He wanted to get credit of being like others without taking the trouble of being so: it was a silent falsehood.

The majesty of truth is seated not altogether without, in our uttered words, but within our conscious hearts. It is not enough that in Christian charity or justice to others we should say no evil, it is necessary also never to keep back the good we are prompted to say or to do in behalf of others.

It was said of a certain man, "He will not lie exactly, but he will keep silent; and his silence and insinuation carry the same impression as though he spoke out." His silence was not golden; it was in such case the absence of gold. It was born of a spirit of detraction of one's neighbor, that feared to malign in spoken word, but lacked the Christian grace to help, when a positive generous loyalty would perhaps have saved another's reputation. It was keeping back the price of justice, because of the lack of bigness and love that would treat even an enemy as we would wish ourselves to be treated.

We need to pray God to keep us from the deceit of our own hearts, to save us from ourselves; for when we refrain from coming to the help of a brother who we know is being wronged unjustly, while outwardly we may not seem blameworthy, inwardly we know that something of real value to our manhood or womanhood has been soiled; we have sinned against Love, we have been false to the high spirit of right and truth.

> "Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts;
> And in the hidden part thou wilt make me to know > wisdom."

The Shepherd's Care for the Sheep

WEDNESDAY, July 5. Ps. 23 : 1-6. "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." There is a fulness of experience and a tone of quiet peace in this psalm, that associate it with David's later years. Through all his stormy career, with its sorrow and sin, he had never ceased to remember those early happy years, when he led his flock to green valleys, beside gentle streams, or through dark ravines; and now he sings of Him who is the true Shepherd and King of men. The first half of the psalm views him as our Shepherd, the second as our Host. In the one we are the sheep of his pasture; in the other the guests at his table and inmates of his house.

Christ leads his flock to rest, work, and sorrow. The rest is depicted in the little green glen with its quiet brooklet. The work is set forth as a path in which we are called to walk, because—as the apostle puts it—"we are created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." The sorrow is as the gloomy valley or sunless ravine, into which the flock descends from the upper lawns where they have been feeding. The dark pine trees line the roadway, and deep down in the gorge the river is falling. It is in such a place that the wild beast lurks, and therefore it is of infinite comfort that our Shepherd holds a rod and a staff. The one is a weapon that will effectually break the heads of the beasts of prey that attack, while the other is the shepherd's crook, adapted to pulling the sheep out of the holes into which they may be fallen. If only we will trust him, Jesus will beat down our enemies before us; and if we are overtaken in a fault, he will extricate and restore us. Is not this full of comfort?

The Light on the Mountain

THURSDAY, July 6. Rev. 21 : 10. "And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain." A certain summer that we passed in a little cottage at the foot of the Jungfrau, in Switzerland, stands out in vivid memory. All about us were the towering Alpine peaks. We were so near them that we were obliged to look almost straight upwards to see their summits. One morning, rising early, we looked to the summit of the snow-clad Jungfrau, which was just being touched by the first red streaks of dawn. It was still dark in the deep valleys below, but that glint of sunshine on the mountain, the harbinger of the new day, changed the whole scene: it lightened the whole dark valley with an anticipatory light.

Tennyson, in an exquisite little poem, pictures the pilgrim toiling in "immeasurable sand," but catching fleeting glimpses ahead of the city, sparkling "like a grain of salt." So the revelator tells us that there are mountain moments given to us, luring us along and showing us in brief flashes the light of the new heavens that one day will be fully revealed. These visions of the larger and fuller life may not come often; yet even one such moment predicts the possibilities of my spirit, shows me the compass of my wings.

We should likewise remember those hours when we are "carried away in the Spirit," those "days of heaven upon earth" . . . They speak to us of a day when our whole earthly city shall be full of the light of God. They speak to us beforehand of a glory that shall be revealed, when the darkness and the conflict shall lessen, and eternity alone be real.

The Sowing and the Reaping

FRIDAY, July 7. Gal. 6 : 7. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." "Sow a thought, reap an act; sow an act, reap a habit; sow a habit, reap character; sow character, reap destiny." All life is knit together. You cannot break the associating link.

A farmer who has sown wild oats may sell his farm to another, and this unfortunate purchaser will have to reap to his disgust and ruin. You cannot get away from your past. Only God can break the entail. In the world of nature, there is an interval of several months between seedtime and harvest. But there is no such definite separation in human experience. Every day we are sowing something for the future and reaping from the past. The two processes are contemporaneous, but the multiplication is similar; some thirty, some sixty, some a hundredfold. Adam's one sin! Think of it—the many were made sinners. Christ's one act of righteousness—a multitude without number, clad in white robes, and palms in their hands. Give every flying minute something to keep in store. You cannot keep from sowing, even though you are idle. Not to do good is to do ill. Not to sow good seed is to sow bad.

Every one is provided with two bags of seed. The one is labeled "to the flesh," that is, for self; the other "to the spirit," that is, for love, for others, for Christ. Sow yourself! You shall live in the lives of an innumerable multitude!

The Divine Artist and His Handiwork

SATURDAY, July 8. Isa. 64 : 8. "But now, O Lord, thou art our Father; we are the clay and thou our Potter, and we all are the work of thy hand." When the Creator saw his own image first molded into manhood, he exclaimed, "It is very good." He did his best. He looked upon the climax of his creative genius only to see man broken by temptation and sin, lying in ruins. Then God called upon his only Son to redeem and refashion us like himself.

In the process of transformation, we notice that we are held in the hollow of his hand. No other can mold us; no tool of human mechanism can shape us. Only the divine touch can give the fashioning beauty. There are those who seek to mold themselves, depending upon education, culture, refinement; but their efforts are fruitless without Almighty skill.

The Divine Artist has an ideal for each individual piece of pottery. Just as no two vessels are alike in form, color, figure or ornamentation in the potter's workhouse, so God gives a distinctive individuality to every soul. One great element of beauty is in variety. The potter realizes that ornamentation is a slower process than molding; so it is with character. God puts in the colors of love, joy, peace, gentleness, kindness and charity, and when the Artist's work is complete, he places us in the fires of purification, that his work may abide forever. The soul is purified and beautified by this baptism of flame, and comes forth from the furnace of affliction tried, fixed, perfected, to shine in the temple of God forever.

Bethlehem Bach Choir Festival

THE eleventh festival of the Bach Choir at Bethlehem, Pa., closed recently with a performance of Bach's Mass in B Minor. The day before, the "Christmas Oratorio" was given. Under the leadership of Dr. J. Fred Wolle, who has been the conductor since the festival started, the compositions were presented complete. The festivals were first given in old Bethlehem, across the river, in the ancient and picturesque Moravian Church. The physical setting suggests, as few in America can do, the surroundings for which Bach's sacred music was composed and in which it was performed under his direction. Some years ago the festival was transferred to the Parker Memorial Church in Bethlehem, a part of Lehigh University, standing in the midst of the beautiful hillside campus, which accommodates an audience twice the size of that of the ancient church. The beginning of the concerts was announced by a trombone choir in the belfry of the church, deeply impressive to the audience on the campus. It is said the Bach Choir rendered the complete Christmas Oratorio, as well as the complete Mass in B Minor, for the first time in America. The Christmas Oratorio has the general appearance of a series of six cantatas, written on the plan of many that Bach composed singly for the different Luther Sunday services and church festivals. Two movements from the Mass in B Minor which closed the festival were presented to Augustus III at one of Bach's frequent visits to Dresden, where he received in 1736 the honorary title of Hofkomponist. There is this reference to the music of the temple service: "The singers went before, the players an instruments followed after." (Ps. 68: 25.)

West Point Unveils Washington Statue

THE first statue of George Washington to be erected at West Point was unveiled an May 19. The statue, representing Washington as a general on horseback, a duplicate of Brawn's famous monument in Unian Square, New York, was given to the academy anonymausly by "a patriotic citizen, a veteran of the Civil War." It was unveiled by Miss Charlotte Delafield, a descendant of the late Major Richard Delafield, who served three tours of duty as superintendent af the institution. The Rev. H. Percy Silver, chaplain at West Point, delivered a short address. Rev. Dr. Charles L. Slattery, rector of Grace Episcopal Church, New York, in making the presentation, said: "I have been intrusted by a patriotic citizen, a veteran of the Civil War, with the honor of presenting to the United States Military Academy this statue of George Washington. The giver desires his name to remain unknown. It is his wish, even his prayer, that this semblance of a righteous man, a brave soldier and an inspired leader of men may keep fresh the ideals of Washington in succeeding generations of yauth here to be trained as soldiers who fear God, and God only. I know that you will guard this statue as a symbol of the honor and loyalty due to our beloved country." Colonel Clarence P. Townsley, the superintendent of the Academy, in brief, fitting words accepted the statue in behalf of the government. How appropriate to put a statue of Washington at West Point, the scene of one of the battles of the Revolution, a militory post, and the spot picked out by Washington as a military training school! How beautiful and befitting that a man who fought to save the republic should present the statue in honor of the one who founded it! They both embodied loyalty to our country, which, from its great blessings of liberty and Christianity, ought to be "an holy uation." (I Peter 2 . 9.)

Cigarettes and Novels

TWO boys, one aged fifteen and one sixteen, messenger boys of J. P. Morgan & Co., New York, were entrusted with a bundle of bills for the payroll of a department of the bank amounting to $10,515. The boys ran away with the money and were arrested in Philadelphia the afternoon of the same day and brought back and into court. They were penitent, and the judge got them to tell him what made them commit the crime. They told him they were hard cigarette smokers and readers of dime novels, and that they planned to go to Kentucky, get a blooded horse apiece, and go as Texan rangers to find Villa and punish Mexico for its raids into the United States. The older boy was put under $1000 bail, and the younger was sent to the juvenile court for examination. All but $240 of the money was recovered. Poor, silly little sinners! Because they were smart and honest, the bank trusted them, and the cigarette and novel-reading habits unbalanced their reason and poisoned their conscience and made criminals of them. May God and man forgive them and give them a new start, and may their misfortune and sin be a warning to other boys who are subjected to city temptations. Their early arrest illustrates this verse: "Be sure your sin will find you out." (Num. 32: 23.)

Tuskegee's New President

MAJOR ROBERT .RUSSA MOTON, a negro of unmixed blood, life-long friend of the late Booker T. Washington, was officially installed recently in the presence of 4,000 persons as principal of Tuskegee Institute. A note of racial good-will was sounded by Governor Henderson of Alabama. William G. Wilcox, president of the New York City Board of Education and presiding trustee, echoed the same sentiments. The announcement was made that $25,000 had been given by Cyrus H. McCormick of Chicago for the Booker T. Washington Memorial fund. In his inaugural address Major Moton said among other things, "While the outlook was never more hopeful, the negro problem is not yet solved. While there is great encouragement in the fact that 70 per cent. of the negro population can read and write, it is not safe to assume that 70 per cent. of the negroes are fully educated. Our progress in this country has been wonderful, and we have reason to rejoice, but shiftlessness, disease, inefficiency and crime are entirely too prevalent among our people." The people of the South as well as the friends in the North are in earnest sympathy with Tuskegee in its great work of preparing colored boys and girls, men and women for the various callings of life. The industrial features of the institution are in obedience to this command of Moses: "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work." (Ex. 20: 9.)

To Pension Army Horse

RODNEY, a faithful army horse, who has served the government steadily for twenty years, is to be retired from active duty and cared for by Uncle Sam for the rest of his life. This will be done on recommendation of Captain C. D. Mortimer of Battery D, Third Field Artillery. Rodney was never sick a day, rendered signal battery service in the Spanish American War, was sold at auction as too old for service, was bought by a member of the Third Field Artillery for $107, rendered the highest service at Fort Myer, and is now pensioned. It is right for the government to take care of Rodney, but let it not forget the old men who have worn themselves out in its service and are not provided with pensions. Let the bill now pending providing for pensions for letter-carriers be passed without delay. The care of Rodney illustrates the principle here enunciated: "A righteous man regardeth the life o is beast." (Prov. 12: 10.)

Alaska's Mighty River

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

BUCKLE on your shoulders the wings of your imagination and come with me for a 500-mile trip on the headwaters of the Yukon. Within the past fifteen days I have made most of the urney on foot, on rail and on steamer, and can point t the sights as we go. We begin in the coast range mountains only fifteen miles from the Pacific ean. Here the river has one of its sources. It rts as a trickling stream of icy cold water and nds its way down the hills and pours into Lake nnett. We take the White Pass Railway and ride enty-five miles along the east shore of that lake to ribou Crossing, and thence an hour or so farther to town of White Horse. We are now at the head the steam navigation of the mighty river, and can l for more than 2,000 miles to where it pours into ring Sea, not far from the Arctic Ocean.

But before we take ship at White Horse let us look the size of the Yukon. The river is one of the gest of the world. There are only four on the rth American continent that surpass it in gth and in the area of the basin it drains. ese are the Mississippi-Missouri, which rises up in the Rockies and is lost in the Mexican lf; the Winnipeg-Nelson, which begins with Saskatchewan in southern Canada and pours waters into Hudson Bay; the Mackenzie, ich flows to the north and empties into the tic Ocean; and the St. Lawrence, the downut which carries the waters of the great es into the Atlantic.

The length of the Yukon, from the source of longest tributary to Bering Sea, is as great the distance from Boston to Salt Lake City, the navigable streams which flow into it, if ned together, would make a canal fit for lowft steamers that would reach as far as from ttle to Shanghai.

The basin of the Mississippi-Missouri takes one-third of the United States, and the basin he Yukon has an area equal to one-tenth or -eleventh of all the lands under the American g.

The navigation of the Yukon compares in its iculties with that of the Mississippi. It kes you think of Mark Twain's description the great river, which he as a pilot knew so l. He said: "If you will peel an apple in e long paring and throw it over your head, shape it will have when it falls on the floor l represent the ordinary curves of the river." shall find this true of the upper Yukon. The eam winds about like a snake. It narrows l widens. Now it is only a few hundred feet n bank to bank, and now almost a lake. The er is full of sandbanks and there are rocky yons through which the boat shoots, almost zing the cliffs.

Our ship is the little steamer Selkirk. It is of y five hundred tons and it draws but four or feet of water. Nevertheless it is so well naged that it twists and turns with the cur- t. I believe it could turn in its own length, at times it swings about as though on a ot.

n addition to the boat itself we have a at barge to care for. The most of the freight ich goes down the Yukon is carried on ges which are pushed along in front the steamers. The load of ay consists largely of cattle. e barge is inclosed in a high rd fence, within which are ht great cow-pens and a ble-deck sheepfold at the k. There are 150 beef cattle the pens and 200 live sheep in fold. The animals have been ught from the other side of the kies by rail from Calgary to couver. At Vancouver they e loaded on a Canadian Pacific mer for Skagway, and carried ough the thousand miles of inld waterways that border the st coast of the continent. They e taken over the mountains on White Pass Railway, and are on their way to Dawson, re they will get another mer that will push them a usand or fifteen hundred miles re down the Yukon and up the ana to Fairbanks.

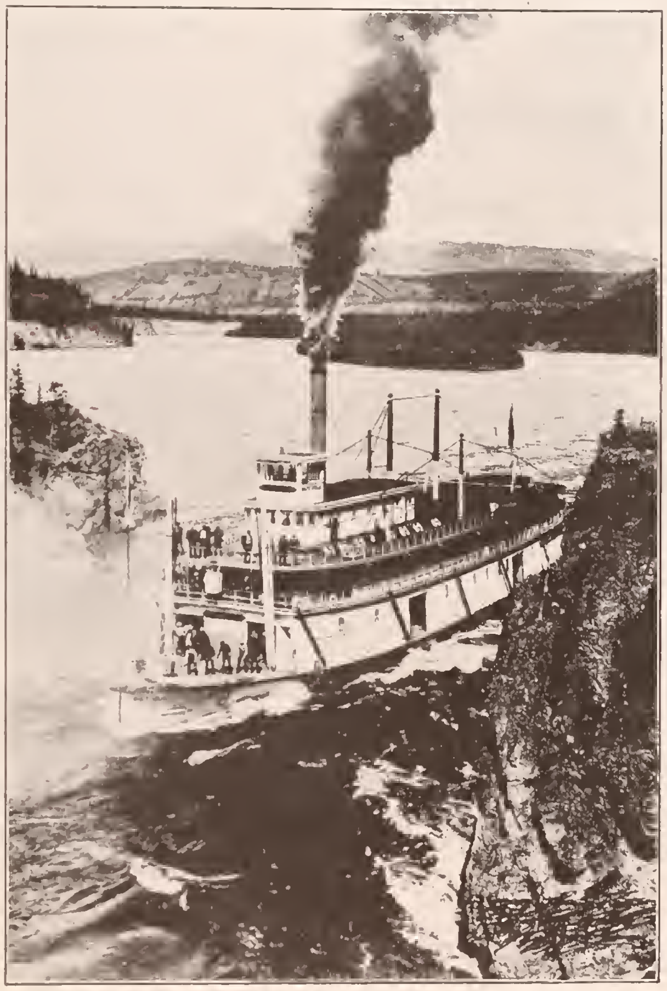
he steamer trip will be more n a week, and they have aldy been weeks on the way. Do wonder that good animals are ected? They have to be good stand the heavy cost of the ight. The steers will average e-fourths of a ton and several them weigh close to 2,000 pounds each. They were raised upon grass and are now fed on the bales of alfalfa piled around the edge of the barge.

But we have other live stock on board. Down in the hold there are 800 chickens bound for the hen fanciers of interior Alaska They crow night and morning, and with the baaing of the sheep and the mooing of the cattle we seem to be in a barnyard floating down stream.

The Selkirk burns wood and we stop several times a day to take on this fuel. Great piles of cordwood have been stacked up on the banks, and this is wheeled in barrows over a gang-plank to the steamer. In many of the places the only dwelling is the cabin of the wood-chopper who supplies the ship at so much a cord. The purser measures the amount taken with a ten-foot pole. The cost is $6 or $7, and, on the down stream, the Selkirk burns about one cord an hour. In coming back against the current the consumption is often four times as much. The wood is largely spruce trees from three to six inches in diameter. The logs are sawed and split, and carefully piled.

Our whole trip is through the wilderness. We seem to have joined the army of early explorers and to be steaming through a new world. We ride for miles seeing only an Indian tent or a cabin. The country has not been touched since Columbus landed on the West Indian Islands. It is much the same as it was when the cave-dwellers, the ancestors of the Eskimos, wrought with their tools of stone.

Nowhere else have I seen any scenery like that of the Yukon. Much of the country is semi-desert and much is as green as the valley of the Nile. Much of the valley has been filled with silt, and the Yukon has changed its course like the Yellow River of China, cutting out new channels and tearing up and throwing down islands. Now we pass through gorges of silt where the sand walls rise above us to the height of a twenty-story office building; and now swing around beds where we seem to be walled in by the cuttings made by the water.



The Selkirk winding through the Five Finger Rapids

Much of our way down the Yukon is in and out among islands. Each island has its own shade of green, from the fresh hue of the first sprouts of the wheat fields to the dark green mixed with silver of the woods of Norway and Sweden. Not a few of the islands are spotted with flowers. Some from which the woods have been cut for the steamers, are covered with fireweed, and a mighty quilt of delicate pink rises out of the water, the black stumps upon it standing out like knots on the surface. Such islands are more gorgeous than the flower beds of Holland.

And then the mountains and valleys! In places there are low hills bordering the Yukon, and behind them mountains that are covered with grass, and still farther on peaks clad in their silvery garments of perpetual snow. At one place far back from the river, rising out of a park of the greenest of green, are rocky formations which look like castles, as clean-cut and symmetrical as any to be seen on the banks of the Rhine; and down in the river itself are other great rocks more terrible than that on which the Lorelei sat and sang to the destruction of the sailors beneath. One such formation is known as "The Five Fingers." It consists of five mighty masses of reddish brown rock that rise to the height of a six-story house, right in the channel through which the steamers must go.

We make our trip down this part of the river between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning, when at this time of the year the sun is just rising. The current is swift and it takes careful piloting. The ship must go just right or it will be dashed to pieces against the great rocks. The captain guides the barge of cattle to the heart of the channel. He puts the barge and the steamer right in the heart of the current and we shoot down between two of these mighty fingers of rock with a rush into the rapids below. As we pass it seems as though the rocks are not more than three feet away on each side of our steamer.

As I have written, we pass the Five Fingers between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning, when the sun is just rising. This is the land of the midnight sun, and there are places not far from where we are where on one or two days of the year the sun does not sink below the horizon.

And this brings to mind the great change in the skies of the Yukon and interior Alaska from those of the rainy southeastern part of the territory. We have left the wet lands, and are now in the dry belt of the great Yukon valley. The air here is as clear as that of Colorado. The sky is deep blue. The clouds are often snow-white, and they chase each other over the heavens, making moving patches of blue velvet plush on the green hills where they cross the face of the sun. The clouds hang low, and we seem to be on the very roof of the world, with the "deep death-like valleys below." We are in the country of Robert Service, the poet of the Yukon, and some of his verses come to our minds:

> I've stood in some mighty-mouthed hollow
> That's plumb-full of hush to the brim;
> I've watched the big, husky sun wallow
> In crimson and gold, and grow dim;
> Till the moon set the pearly peaks gleaming,
> And the stars tumbled out, neck and crop;
> And I've thought that I surely was dreaming,
> With the peace o' the world piled on top.

Now for 191

Today we announce the 1917 Chalmers models.

But before I tell about them I want to express a word or two of appreciation.

I stood in the Convention Hall of our plant in Detroit one day last November and saw 600 men buy $22,000,000 worth of Chalmers cars in 40 minutes. These 600 men were our dealers.

This was a big year's work.

As you read this, just seven months later, these same 600 men have delivered the $22,000,000 worth of cars into the hands of owners. Our dealers have sold in seven months what we expected would take at least twelve months to accomplish.

I want to thank our organization for the achievement—for achievement is the word. Our gain is big—792 per cent in sales in a year. And we have with us today just 631 more dealers than we had seven months ago—631 who had made envious records in distributing other cars.

These cars today have been run more than 1,000,000 miles.

They are the 3400 r. p. m. Chalmers models.

And our service records show a percentage of 99.21 perfect.

We never have made a car so good.

So it was only natural that we should build on
r. p. m. Chalmers as a basis for our 1917 product.

We have done so; and we have built the 1917 34

The Third Fourth

By LOUIS E. ORCUTT

SANITY and safety are now so much a part of the celebration of the nation's birthday that the celebrations of twenty-five years ago, with their soul-thrilling noise, their military enthusiasm and their constant threat of juvenile dismemberment, are fast becoming mere memories, material for grandfather's tales in the not far distant future. I was brought up on the old-fashioned "Fourth." I got my full share of burns and frights, but escaped the permanent subtraction of any of my person by that narrow margin which is yet enough. My chum and I had exhibited our courage in all the vainglorious ways known to youths handling fireworks. But one thing we had not done. We had not been permitted to camp out all night before the "Fourth."

For two "Fourths" in succession I had been shocked into sudden consciousness by the "bang" of a cannon-cracker on my window-sill. Sometimes the "bang" would be followed by another; and always it was accompanied by that derision which is the usual greeting of the early riser to the sleepyhead. My chum had been similarly served. It was not our fault that we were in bed at 5:30 A.M. on the Day of Independence. It was distinctly the result of our inability to be independent. The other boys, whose mothers our mothers held to be very careless and unwise, had spent those two nights before the Fourth rolled up in blankets on the broad porch at Tom's. Each time we had surreptitiously and feloniously supplied ourselves with blankets, but we had not dared to participate in the bivouac without seeking maternal permission. This we had not found. Instead we found an immovable body of opposition and were kept in sight all evening and bundled off to our accustomed couches at the accustomed time. Each time we had resolutely lain awake determined not to sleep a wink, resolved, with all the desperation of thwarted boyhood, to be awake and ready for the first faint ray of dawn; and each time we had at last succumbed to weariness and had slept soundly—all too soundly—until the salute of the freemen had banished slumber.

WHEN the third "Fourth" approached we held a council of war. We just must be a part of this year's bivouac on the porch. Determined to beat down all opposition, we descended in force upon each mother individually hoping by superior numbers to secure the permission hitherto withheld. We were beaten back in disorder. There seemed to be some sort of wireless communication between those mothers. The fortresses were impregnable.

We spent a whole week of afternoons after school deciding to hook a blanket apiece and just stay out anyway. We had every step in the process carefully planned and every possible misstep provided against. The whole problem of getting to sleep on that porch, properly equipped, proved ridiculously simple. The only problem that worried us was the problem of staying there. We were not afraid that we would repent of our rashness and return voluntarily to our abandoned beds. We were afraid of an involuntary return. We knew our mothers.

Nevertheless, on one point there could be no surrender. We must camp out somewhere. We hit upon a new plan of attack. We would get permission to camp out in my chum's yard. Very much to our surprise, both mothers gave reluctant permission, possibly because they knew we had no tent or other shelter.

PERMISSION gained, we at once set about the organization of our camp. We found an old dry-goods box which seemed pretty tight, and which, laid down on its side, was wide enough to bunk us both. It was a trifle short; but that was a trifle not worth bothering about. We placed the box under the eaves between the barn and the fence, a nice dry, quiet spot; the barn was not in use. A dozen or so of old grain bags made a good bed—the musty s ll would be a good preliminary for po er smoke—and a remnant of ingrain c et promised to serve as well as a bla et to cover us. We planned to ke pillows of our coats; and we spe a good part of the afternoon of the rd of July practicing, in our camp, he proper manner of going to sleep a of waking to action. We stowed ur precious store of explosives unde ur pillows. Our mothers inspected ur camp late in the afternoon; and, ile they did not pronounce it "g ," they did not condemn it. It as, however, a very nervous pair of ys who showed the camp and its surpa ng comforts to those mothers.

After supper we sat a long ti on the doorstep of our camp and only t ed in when the last faint glow of tw ht was yielding to the dark. We curl up on our bed, pulled up our carpet nd rested our heads on our coats. I a few minutes we experienced comf in mind and body. Then I became are that both my heels and my head r pressing against the ends of my d. In adjusting myself to relieve he pressure I wakened my chum. W l curled up enough to avoid the en of the box he had too little room; nd when he found comfort I was cro ed. We could sleep on our backs wit our knees up; but then the carpet fai to cover us. Even that position ew tiresome; and, besides, dozing o our backs brought wild dreams of the n that were to be on the morrow—d ms which banished sleep and le us breathless and awake in every w We turned and twisted and talke n wondered how long it would be or morning. We were sure we had e there nearly all night. In the int al between our efforts in pursuit o as we planned, over and over, the ut that we would give those porch-d ler an hour before sunrise.

THEN came a flash of light a an immediate crash. We sat u and rubbed our eyes. We thought, a rst, that the other boys had found our mp and had made a night attack; I we heard no voices and no fading fo ll. We waited and listened. At l we heard a faint spat-spat on the ea of the barn above us and we curl up again for another near snooze. The too on the roof grew louder and more ular and I almost slept. As I lay ther hal dreaming, I heard a new sound. The water was dripping from the eav onto our box. The box had seemed ti . It proved otherwise. Piloted by a out drop, which fell fairly in my e and which was followed by another o that traced the high water mark arou my neck, a whole army corps of rops invaded our camp and dampen m side of the bed. I grabbed my c an huddled into the rear corner of t box My chum soon found it exped t crouch beside me. Thus we wai o the storm.

As I sat hunched up in the co r the box I could not help thinking the soft comfort of my bed; but I too game to admit, even to myself, at was not entirely happy as I . remarked, half aloud, that I w ered if our mothers knew it had rain

"That ain't what's worryin ne my chum answered. "I just ho your mother stays t' home. If she omes over to see my mother they's n ellin what's a goin' t' happen. W e all right if they'll just let us alone.'

MY chum's mother was a uant when she took a stand; sh was not as rapid at taking the i at e as was mine. With my mother, ision always led to action. I, myself, s ha afraid that my mother would e for me; and, also, I was half af l s e wouldn't. While we had turned p e dry side of our bed, it was dry ly comparison with the other sid and where our bodies pressed it do , the dampness soon became appare ev through our clothing. Morning em a long way off. My knees and s a

Tires that do not manufacture Vibration

ST. CRISPIN, patron Saint of the Shoemakers, first "Carpeted the Earth with leather."

That "Miracle" he performed by the intelligent device of putting leather soles under the King's feet.

The Pneumatic Tire went him one better, by "Carpeting the Earth" with a soundless, vibrationless, Cushion of Compressed Air.

Without that vibrationless "riding on Air," Motoring never could have become the Luxurious Sensation which has made it the World's greatest outdoor attraction, — a delightful soaring over cushioned roads, instead of merely driving over them with jolt and jar transmitted from every pebble and rut.

This "Pneumatic" quality in a Tire, then, is its most VALUABLE characteristic, producing a result which chiefly justifies the total expense of Car-Ownership.

WHY then, should Car Owners tolerate Tires in which the Fabric is so many-layered as to render them stiff, thick, slow in action, and no longer truly Pneumatic.

—Tires that are "Muscle-bound," and so cannot flexibly negotiate the myriad pebbles, and minor road ruts, in order to absorb Vibration ?

—Why should Car Owners pay additional for "Semi-Pneumatic" Tires, which also have "pebbles," and "ruts" of Rubber deliberately MOULDED ON TO THEM in the form of unbridged projections ?

Why should the Car Owner equip his Car to deliberately manufacture Vibration, even on the smoothest roads, by bounding from one unbridged Non-skid tread projection to another, as from pebble to pebble and from rut to rut ?

OBSERVE—in Diamond Tires, as pictured above, the skillful bridging of the Squegee, (Non-skid) Tread grips, to conserve Pneumatic smoothness of running.

Observe that these bridged Non-skid grips, while guarding against Side-skid, or Forward-Skid, in Mud, Snow, or Slippery places, do not manufacture Vibration themselves.

Observe, too, that this efficient Diamond "Squegee" tread enormously strengthens the Tire, by its bridged construction, avoiding thereby that uneven pressure, in spots, which tends to separate layers of Fabric.

DIAMOND Tires are TRUE Pneumatic Tires.

Springy, Flexible, Buoyant, Vibrationless and Power-Increasing (which means Gasolene-saving, too).

Their black "Velvet" rubber Treads are deliberately made Stretchy, Strong, and Clingy, so that they may freely and flexibly "negotiate" the myriad small obstacles on the road.

—Obstacles which might cut into stiffer and slower Tires, while injuriously jarring the Car Mechanism, and uncomfortably jolting the Car Occupants, at every pebble and rut.

Ride, even once, on 1916 "Velvet" Rubber DIAMOND Tires, and note a new satisfaction in Motoring.

—More ready Response-to-Power,—more Liveliness in action,—further Coasting capacity, and the greatest travel-range, for each Dollar invested in Tires, that Tires have ever given you.

Then compare the moderate fair-listed prices of these nimble, long-lived, Diamond Tires, with what you must pay for heavy "Muscle-bound" Tires, that have NOT the luxurious PNEUMATIC quality of Diamond Squegees.

The Third Fourth

back began to ache from the cramped position. Technically, I was perfectly comfortable; actually, I wished that morning, or some other deliverer, would come speedily. We were pretty tired by this time and we really dropped to sleep; but not for long. We were awakened by the approach of two voices whose tones we could not mistake. I peeked out of the box and saw a lantern bobbing up the path from my chum's house. In its light walked two shawled figures.

"They're comin'," I whispered.

"I knew it," he answered, "your mother just couldn't let us be."

I overlooked the insinuation.

"Better be sound asleep," he cautioned; and we were both playing a good game of 'possum when the lantern stopped before our camp.

For a time there was unanimous silence. Then a whispered conference was followed by a gentle inquiry as to whether or not we had better come home to bed. We slept on. Then a hand shook me gently and then less gently.

"Le' me 'lone. Whajadoin'?" I asked sleepily.

"Come, sonny, come home and go to bed."

"Aw, I'm a'right. What's th' use? It's pretty near mornin'," I answered.

"It's only eleven-thirty," my mother replied, "and it's been raining and is going to rain more. I don't think it's best for you to stay here any longer."

I knew the tone.

"It's nice and dry here, and anyway you said we could stay here," my chum took up the battle.

Two pairs of maternal hands began feeling of our bed, and the "nice and dry" argument was utterly ruined.

My chum sputtered, "You told us we could," all the way down the path to his kitchen door, and he told my mother with mournful repetition that if she'd just stayed to home we'd ha' been all right. His mother rebuked him quietly and told him that if my mother had not come for her she would surely have gone after us alone. If I had been more certain of that I would have felt more keenly the opprobrium of my mother's action. As it was I found the smooth sheets of my bed a welcome haven; and I did not even feel badly when the usual Independence Day salute sent me scrambling for my clothes. I hurried out and set the cracker that wakened my chum; but I felt just a little jealous when I found that, on account of the storm, Tom's mother had let the boys sleep on the parlor rug.

Reaction

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

FOURTH of July was always a vastly exciting day in my young life. I remember how I used to wake at the first crack o' dawn to the sound of the booming of cannon. I remember how I used to struggle hastily into a brown linen dress, how I would tie back my unbrushed hair and hurry frantically out of doors. I remember how I spent the daytime hours in the midst of a gray smoky haze, shooting off firecrackers and banging torpedoes. I remember the firecracker that exploded long after I thought it had gone out, and my consequent scream with pain. I remember my burned fingers and my scorched dress and my skinned knees.

The Fourth of July was always a vastly exciting twenty-four hours. The day after the Fourth was a tired day, when I was prone to stay in bed long after breakfast time, when my head ached and my burns pained me. The day after the Fourth of July seemed unutterably disagreeable, horribly dull.

I remember when folk began to talk of the "safe and sane" Fourth of July celebration. It was a very new thought, and I remember how strange the idea of a firecrackerless Fourth seemed. I remember how I turned up my rather small nose at the idea of picnics and parades and music.

The first "safe and sane" celebration in our town was a huge success. It was not as wildly exciting as the crashing, booming Fourth of July, but there was no danger of burning one's hands or of putting out one's eyes. It was not wildly exciting, and yet I look back on that day with more pleasure than I can conjure up over the smoky picture of a small girl in a faded brown linen frock shooting off firecrackers.

The day after the "safe and sane" celebration was very different from the day after the noisy Fourth. It was so very pleasant to be free from headaches and pain and a nauseating tired feeling. Instead of staying in bed and grumbling crossly, one had time to think of what the Fourth of July really stood for.

I KNOW a girl who goes at all tasks and pleasures in a hurried, flurried, bang-bang sort of a way. When a new task comes to her attention she goes at it as I went at my fireworks—waking early in the morning and living in a feverish whirl through all of the smoke-begrimed day. Sometimes she burns herself—deep burns in her mind or her heart—sometimes she becomes exhausted. I know another girl who is that one's exact opposite, who goes at tasks and pleasures in a safe and sane way, taking time to go coolly, comfortably, restfully after what she is striving for. I am going to tell you a small incident in the lives of the two girls.

BOTH girls, who were friends, were employed to teach and supervise the children who spent most of their waking hours on a large playground. The positions were exactly alike, but the man who employed them made this statement when he told them that they might try the work. "One of you girls," he said, "will, at the end of a month, get a better position than she now has. One of you will be made the head of the playground force with an increase in salary. The other will keep the position that she started with. The most capable girl will be the one who wins."

The two girls were good friends. In a perfectly straightforward way they began to do their best work, for each one knew that only best work would count and that, friendship or no friendship, there was only one position.

The first girl went at the playground work in her characteristically spasmodic way. She worked desperately hard, she wore herself out with nerves and excitement, she toiled under the blazing summer sun; she was very like a small girl shooting off firecrackers, steadily, without resting. The second girl went at the work in her characteristically calm way. Her work was not spectacular or showy, but she accomplished, each day, what she had set out to do. And yet at the end of the month it looked as if the first girl was going to win the coveted position.

The first of the month the employer met the second girl on her way to work. "Miss Smith," he announced without preliminaries, "you don't get the results that your friend gets, but from now on you will be the head of the playground force."

"Why?" stammered the girl, a bit taken aback by his bluntness. "Why?"

"Your friend won't be back this summer," answered the man. "She is in bed at home, very ill from overwork!"

REACTION always comes when one has gone at a task too hard. The reaction may take the form of illness, or shattered nerves, or a disgust for the work that once seemed pleasant. It may be a long time in coming, or it may come at once, but it is sure to come. For the constant, unceasing shooting off of firecrackers—be they mental ones or only the red paper kind—is sure to leave burns, and grimy smoke, and a great weariness of soul.

The Thessalonian Christians

International Sunday School Lesson for July 9
I Thes. 1; 2 : 17-20; 4 : 13-18

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that are fallen asleep in Jesus will God bring with him." I Thes. 4 : 14.

Repeatedly on the walls of the Catacombs one reads the words "Obdormivit in Christo"—"He slept in Christ." The manner of death is not specified. It may have been through unspeakable torture, or by the gentle slackening of the golden cord of life; but the result was the same. The poor, tired, suffering body was at rest. This phrase, however, does not bear the interpretation forced on it by some, that there is a pause placed on our conscious existence, when soul and body part company. The natural phenomenon of sleep does not bear out such a contention. We know that the mind is as busy during the hours of sleep as in those of waking. It is even contended that in sleep the soul quits the body and pursues an independent life, until the moment of awaking summons it back to its dwelling-place. The whole trend of New Testment teaching is in the same direction, as for instance: "Absent from the body, present with the Lord." This verse bears out the same contention, for clearly if God is bringing with Jesus, on his Second Advent, those who have died, they must be with him now. They could not come in his company, unless they were already in his company, waiting to be brought. That they enjoy a sentient, blessed, conscious, and helpful life is clear. We may not speak to them directly, lest we break in on their blessed engagements. But they are "with the Lord," and perhaps he will tell them whatever they need to know

Letter from a Tent-Maker

By Arthur H. Howland

WE learned last week that there lived in the town of Thessalonica a man named Jason. We do not know what his business was, but there is some ground for thinking he may have had one or more looms in his house for the purpose of weaving tent cloth, probably made from black goat's-hair. At any rate he had two or three guests once upon a time, and one of the guests asserted later that on this visit to Thessalonica he spent all his time working at an occupation which produced some money, or at least paid his expenses; and we learn from other records in the life of this traveler that he was a tent-maker. A little later when he came to Corinth he found two friends who belonged to the same craft and there lodged and toiled with them. So we are reasonably safe in guessing that Jason was a tent-maker, and that Paul worked early in the morning and late at night at this very lowly task of weaving tent cloth from goat-hair.

But although he labored night and day at a loom, he spent a good deal of time doing something else, as we learned in our last lesson. He reasoned with the Jews out of the Scriptures, proving to many of them that Jesus was the Messiah; he won a number of converts from the Gentiles also; he founded a Christian church. He left his companions Silas and Timothy in Berea, a neighboring city, while he went on to Athens, where Silas and Timothy joined him. He found himself thinking so much of the welfare of the little group of Christians in Thessalonica that he sent Timothy back to see how they were prospering. By the time Timothy returned to him Paul had moved on to Corinth (Acts 18 : 1-5). Then from his lodgings at Corinth in the home of Aquila and Priscilla he wrote a beautiful letter back to Jason the tent-maker at Thessalonica and his fellow Christians there. This letter has been known to the church ever since these early days as the "First Epistle to the Thessalonians."

It is a beautiful letter, filled with intimate, affectionate personalities; deep spiritual teachings; brave and joyous words of Christian hope and comfort. Paul includes, as senders of the letter, his friends Silas and Timothy, who had been with him at Thessalonica. Sylvanus is simply another form of the name Silas.

He expresses first a wish for grace and for peace to come to them, grace signifying all the riches of salvation; peace, the deep and abiding comforts of God. He thanks God for their faithfulness as he remembers their faith, their love and their patience (verses 2 and 3).

He declares that the Gospel as it came to them from the lips of himself and his companions came not in word only but in power, and in the Holy Spirit, and in much assurance. Preachers and evangelists and missionaries who do their work now with this same equipment are having results just as glorious as Paul and his friends had long ago. There is a beautiful touch in the last part of that fifth verse: "Ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake." Here is a picture of men living earnestly, gently, purely, bravely for the sake of their influence upon others. The result was, of course, that many followed their example, and so became followers of the Lord (verse 6). And the further result was that they became examples to the other believers in Macedonia and in Greece.

OUR lesson simply takes three little bits from this beautiful letter. The first section, the ten verses of the first chapter, at which we have just now briefly glanced; the second, verses 17 to 20 of the second chapter; then verses 13 to 18 of the fourth.

The second section states how eager Paul had been to see them after his first visit, and how he had been hindered, and contains the beautiful assurance that these faithful Christians at Thessalonica were his hope, his joy, his crown of rejoicing.

The third section deals with a subject that had greatly perplexed the Thessalonian Christians. They rejoiced in Christ while they and their friends were alive, but they were still afraid of death. When their Christian friends died they grieved "even as others."

I shall never forget the funeral of S. H. Hadley. It was a time of triumph rather than defeat. Tears and grief were almost drowned in the great tides of gladness and hope, as the passing of that great consecrated soul made a shining path of light into the unseen world. Dr. A. T. Pierson took occasion to rebuke the widespread habit of Christians of putting on signs of mourning at the obsequies of their believing friends and placing symbols of grief upon their tombs. So Paul begs these Thessalonian Christians not to sorrow as others who have no hope. He argues wisely and unanswerably that if God brought Jesus from the dead he would also bring again from the dead those who die in the faith and fellowship of Christ.

Then follows Paul's beautiful conception of the end of all things. Jesus is coming back, he declares; those who died in the faith are to be raised first; then those who are still living "shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air. So shall we ever be with the Lord."

PAUL evidently thought that Jesus was coming back to earth before he himself should have finished this earthly life. He was disappointed in this, but there is no doubt that he has long ago met his Lord. Nor is there any doubt that all those who are faithful shall meet him too, and shall rejoice in his companionship forever.

The Final Result
Of a Man Whom You'll Respect

The Mid-Year Mitchell shows the finished effort of John W. Bate, the efficiency engineer.

It comes from a factory which he designed. It is built by methods which he worked out to reduce factory costs to the minimum.

And the car itself is the 17th model built under his direction. It combines all his 700 improvements. It typifies his ideal of mechanical perfection.

John W. Bate has for 30 years held the foremost place in efficiency as applied to machinery building. And this New Mitchell, in a hundred ways, shows a genius that you'll respect.

It Seems a Lavish Car

The Mid-Year Mitchell looks extravagant. It is big and handsome and roomy. It combines in one car all the new touches, all the best ideas of the year. Before its completion our experts examined 257 this-year models.

It has 26 costly extras—things which other cars omit. And each is a feature you'll want.

The car is finished in 22 coats. The upholstery is French-finished leather. The springs are 10 inches deep.

For ease of driving it has ball-bearing steering gear. It has a unique and easy control. It has an engine primer at the driver's hand.

For ease of riding it has Bate cantilever springs. You never knew such a comfortable car.

Yet note the Mitchell price. No other car of this size and power and class sells as low as this does. That is one result of Mr. Bate's efficiency.

Big Margins of Safety

The Mitchell is a light car, weighing under 3000 pounds. It is a marvel of economy in fuel.

Yet every part is designed to be 50 per cent stronger than necessary.

Instead of castings, Mr. Bate uses tough, light steel, three times as strong as castings. He uses much Chrome-Vanadium steel.

One Bate-built Mitchell has run 218,732 miles. Six of them have averaged 164,372 miles each. That's over 30 years of ordinary service.

The Mitchell is built for a lifetime car. It is almost trouble-proof. Those are other results of Mr. Bate's genius for efficiency.

When you buy a high-grade car to keep we believe you will want the Mitchell. We know you will if you learn the facts.

No other car is built by these methods. No other car embodies all these improvements. No other car is so complete.

Go to your Mitchell dealer and see what Mr. Bate has done for you and yours by his 13 years of work on this car and this plant.

Growth of Government Bonds

ON September 2, 1789, by an act of Congress, the Treasury Department of the United States was established. The first Secretary of the Treasury was Alexander Hamilton, who was appointed by President Washington September 11, 1789.

Alexander Hamilton had faith that the government could pay its debts and succeeded in convincing Congress that he was right. The government soon had an indebtedness amounting to $72,775,895, of which $12,556,874 was foreign and $40,256,802 was domestic, while the combined debt of the states, which was assumed, was $19,962,219.

By January 1, 1849, the debt of the United States had reached $63,000,000, most of which was due to the Mexican War. This was increased $5,000,000 in 1850 by the payment of the Texas Indemnity. On January 1, 1857, our total debt amounted to $28,699,831, but after 1857 the debt increased until in 1861 it amounted to $90,580,873.

At the opening of the Civil War, our treasury was depleted and the national credit reduced to a 12 per cent. basis. In those days there was no machinery for the collection of newly created internal taxes. This country had no uniform currency, and the banks were not generally patriotic. Naturally, the expenses of the government during the Civil War grew with wonderful rapidity, and from 1856 to 1861, inclusive, the expenditures of the government amounted to about $65,000,000 annually. In 1865, the closing year of the war, the total sum of $1,297,555,224 was reached.

In 1862 a great popular war loan, issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500 and $1,000, was placed directly with the people, and the other great war loan was a seven-thirty per cent. three-year loan issued under the Acts of June 30, 1864, and March 3, 1865. This loan sold at par in currency of the United States, to give an idea of the increased confidence obtained by the government after the close of the war. The markets were flooded with previous government issues. Five hundred and thirty million of these loans were placed easily during the months of June and July, 1865.

Since the days of the Civil War the popularity of United States bonds or securities has continued to increase, and our credit now is beyond question. The wealth behind the credit of the United States is estimated at two hundred billions of dollars.

The rich estates that seek government bonds for investment find it desirable to purchase them from regular dealers, as they are given immediate delivery. In the event of sale, the same rule prevails.

Government bonds are either coupon or registered bonds. Coupon bonds, being payable to bearer, may be transferred without assignment, and are therefore more desirable for sale and delivery than registered bonds. The interest on the coupons is payable to the bearer upon presentation at any sub-treasury in the United States, and the holder of coupon bonds may collect his interest without the necessity of being identified. One point is of interest, and that is, the courts have decided that a coupon bond payable to bearer is valid in the hands of an innocent bona fide holder who has acquired it by purchase at a fair market price without the knowledge that it may have been fraudulently obtained by a previous holder. The fact that lost or stolen coupon bonds have been advertised by their numbers is not sufficient to invalidate the title of an innocent holder.

Coupon bonds may be converted into registered bonds of the same issue at the Treasury Department in Washington, but there is no provision of law which will allow holders to convert registered bonds into coupon bonds.

Answers to Financial Queries

G. S., INDIANA. The California Petroleum Corporation was incorporated in Virginia in 1912. It is a holding company and owns approximately 99 per cent. of the stock of the American Petroleum Company, also owns approximately 96 per cent. of the outstanding stock of the American Oil Fields Company. The capitalization consists of $17,500,000 authorized, of which $14,877,065 are outstanding. This is deposited in a voting trust until October 1, 1917. The preferred issue of 7 per cent. cumulative consists of $17,500,000 authorized, of which $12,343,026 are outstanding. The preferred is redeemable at 120, and it shares equally with the common in dividends, after 7 per cent. has been paid on the common. There has been some question regarding the properties of this company, and the continued flow of wells. The shares of the company must be considered as a speculative investment, and are not recommended in this column as an investment for women.

E. R. S., OHIO. Cuba Cane Sugar Company is one of the largest holding sugar organizations in Cuba. It is well financed, and is reported to be piling up extraordinary earnings. The stock has no par value, but is divided into two classes of preferred and common of $50,000,000 each. So long as the war lasts, the earnings of sugar companies will continue to be large, but what may occur after the close of the European war is a question. Regardless of the large earnings said to be accumulating, the purchase of Cuba cane stocks at present should be considered as speculative.

B. A. D., VIRGINIA. International Mercantile Marine Securities are occupying a unique position. The company was thrown into receivership, although a larger sum was in the treasury than was required to pay the interest on the company's bonds. Since the beginning of the war, the assets of the company have increased in value, and earnings have been tremendous comparatively. There are three committees representing the different committees of bondholders, of preferred stockholders, and common stockholders, and they seem to have reached an agreement regarding a reorganization plan. The purchase of either preferred or common stocks of International Mercantile Marine is a speculation, although over 80 per cent. of back dividends have accumulated on the preferred, which may be paid sooner or later.

R. B. C., MICHIGAN. The Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific situation has not been settled, and the bondholders' and stockholders' committees have not reached an agreement, at least that has been made public. It is said that the plan now is to issue preferred certificates to retire the debentures and arrange for a proper consideration of all the present stockholders. If you purchase Rock Island shares now, you must be prepared to pay an assessment if the final adjustment may include one. The road runs through a very rich and prosperous territory, and under good management should be one of the large carriers showing big earnings among the railroad systems.

C. U. V., ALABAMA. Regarding the Universal Oil and Gas Company shares which are being offered to the public: In a report sent out, it is stated that the capital stock consists of one million shares, par value $5. Stock outstanding amounts to $1,350,000, and stock in treasury is $3,650,000. The company is incorporated under the laws of Delaware, was organized as a holding organization, and controls approximately 32,361 acres of oil and gas territory in Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia. The statement of the company shows that the total net profits of the combined holdings, based on present production, are estimated at $411,300. At the present time, the purchase of shares in this company is more or less a speculation, and we would advise caution.

publishing a great deal of inflammatory material attacking the American government. The hope for cooperation of Carranza troops is not materializing. Whatever the nature of this government's reply to Carranza's latest note, evidence reaching the government indicates that the Carranza government is steadily growing weaker, and that it is either unwilling or unable to stem the tide of anti-foreign sentiment that is being propagated on the basis of the presence of American troops in Mexico. The tension between the American government and the government of Carranza was materially increased on June 16 by a notice sent to General Pershing by the Carranza General Jacinto Trevino to the effect that any movement of American troops from their present lines to the south, east or west would be considered a hostile act and a signal to commence warfare. Mexican citizens in Juarez were also at the same time ordered to present themselves for military instruction. In spite of these demonstrations, Major Grey entered Mexico in pursuit of the latest raiders, but at last reports had neither found their trail nor come into collision with any Carranza troops.

AND NOW HE FEELS BETTER. The Ohio State Journal reports that a certain fisherman of Mount Vernon who has been greatly troubled by a tickling sensation in various portions of his alimentary canal was recently relieved by a surgical operation. A four-inch lizard, very much alive, was removed from the man's stomach.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

TOWARD the middle of the week (June 9-16) London announced that the office of Secretary of State for War had been offered to Lloyd George, and that his acceptance of this office was expected.

The British report a total casualty list of officers from the beginning of the war to May 1 of 26,304 Of these 8,108 have been killed or died of wounds, 16,344 wounded and 1,852 missing; the loss in officers of high rank during April was rather smaller than usual.

The British also gave out a synopsis of the German official casualty lists to the end of May as follows: Dead, 734,412; wounded, 1,785,652; prisoners and missing, 338,522. This would make the permanent losses for the duration of the war about 1,800,000. During May there were 22,471 killed, 72,075 wounded, and 7,961 prisoners and missing; not quite up to the average losses per month so far in the war.

Holland, for no discoverable reason, at the very beginning of the week made an official statement that her army is thoroughly equipped and prepared for any possible war.

A VERY important political event took place in Italy on Sunday last when the Salandra ministry presented its resignation. The immediate cause of this resignation was an adverse vote of the Chamber of Deputies the day before on a minor financial question, but in reality the trouble has been brewing for some months.

At the time Salandra presented the resignation of the ministry, he was directly accused from the floor of the chamber of having instigated the riots which took place in various Italian cities in the spring of 1915, under the leadership of Ricotti Garibaldi, D'Annunzio, the poet, and other like agitators, for the express purpose of forcing the hand of the Italian chamber in respect to the vote on Italy's participation in the war. The fact that such an accusation was brought indicates that the party in Italy opposed to war, which has always been a large one, has grown stronger of late and now dares to show its teeth. The King has charged Signor Botelli, a veteran politician, with the formation of a new cabinet. From the names already chosen, which include Giolitti, Italy's strong man, it seems probable that the new cabinet will not be a very long-lived one, and that a few months, perhaps weeks, hence, Giolitti will take the reins of power into his own hands. He has at his back practically all the elements of conservative opinion in Italy, with which the war has never been popular.

The political situation in Italy is grave, but the economic situation is even graver, while the military situation at present achieved has been a bitter disappointment; so that anything is possible.

In front of Verdun during the week most of the activity was on the north front, where, according to the French, the Germans bombarded heavily the district south of the Thiaumont farm, the Chapitre wood, the Fumin wood and the region south of Damloup, no infantry attack taking place. On the west front there was some minor infantry fighting south and southwest of Hill 304 of an indecisive character. On the north front the Germans launched, the French say, attack after attack on the so-called Thiaumont redoubt, all of which were repulsed. The region west and south of Fort Vaux and the forts of Souville and Tavannes were heavily bombarded.

The British continue to make progress in their campaign in German East Africa. Bismarcksburg, on the southern shore of Lake Tanganyika, has been captured by a British force operating from Nyasaland, while Mombo, on the railroad has been captured by another force moving from the north.

In the Caucasus the Turks continue to be successful in pounding the Russian center, which now has retreated a considerable distance along the whole front. The Mesopotamia front is without change. Near Aden, however, there has been some minor activity.

A Russian loan of $50,000,000, the proceeds of which are to be entirely used in paying for supplies purchased in this country, has been put out during the week by prominent American financial houses. As the bulk of this will probably be taken as payment by the concerns furnishing the supplies, it does not seem probable that much of it will be offered to the general public.

The Austrian offensive in Italy is moving slowly. Southeast of Gallio, to the east of Asiago, the Austrians gained some ground. Elsewhere on this south Tyrol front honors appear to have been about even, though there was hard fighting at many points, particularly on the front south of the Posnia-Astico line, but until the Italians manage to get to the north of this line they will have made no real advance.

THE Russian offensive in Volhynia (south Russia) and Galicia continues. In Volhynia the results arrived at are clear. An advance has been made to the west of considerable but irregular depth from the old line which ran north and south from practically the outskirts of Dubno. In this advance the two fortresses of Dubno and Lutsk, lost last autumn, have been retaken, and at a point directly to the west of Lutsk the line pushed forward some ten or twelve miles more.

From this point the new line curves northeasterly, rejoining the old line at or near Kolki. To the south the line runs almost straight from Lutsk, but a little to the southeast, to a point about five miles to the northwest of Tarnopol in Galicia.

The Russian offensive was evidently a complete surprise to the Austrians, who withdrew before the first impetuous advance to new positions, where, with the support of reserves, the rear-guard actions became a serious resistance before which the advancing Russians were halted and in some places thrown back. The net result appears to be that the Austrian line in Bukowina, formerly on the eastern bank of the Strypa River, is now west of the western bank, while the Russians are threatening Czernowitz, the capital of Bukowina, from the north and east, and the fighting along the whole line is said to be the most terrific yet developed on any front in this sanguinary war. Official reports from Petrograd claim the capture since the beginning of the offensive of one general, three commanders, 2,467 officers, six doctors, 150,000 men, 163 cannon, 266 machine guns, 139 bomb-throwers and thirty-two mine-throwers. The Russians are still pressing westward, their offensive has spread north of the Minsk Marshes, and the whole German and Austrian line appears to be hard pressed. At Baranovichi German trenches were captured on June 13, only to be retaken by a German counter-attack. In the Baltic, on June 13, a force of Russian destroyers and submarines came up with a fleet of German merchantmen under convoy of destroyers and armed trawlers. In the resulting action the Russians claim to have sunk two destroyers and one auxiliary vessel, this claim being in part supported by information from Swedish sources. While the Russian advance may not be the beginning of the much heralded general offensive, it is interesting to note that it has been accompanied by greater Allied activity on all fronts, Allied vessels shelling the Bulgarian coast on June 13, while the Italians attacked with some slight success on the Isonzo front east of Monfalcone on June 14, and the Canadians retook on the 13th the trenches lost on June 2. Semi-official statements in Paris on June 15 indicated that the British would soon make a general attack in Flanders, and that the strategy of all the Allies was to be united for an offensive on all fronts at once.

The Christian Herald has been our much-loved family paper for many years, and is the most popular of the score of papers for which we subscribe. It strikes a broad, universal note. "For Humanity" might well be its motto. MRS. J. O. M.
New Haven, Conn.

Say what you please of might,
It settles nothing right.

What Mrs. Junebride Learned at the Neighborhood Club

Said Mrs. Junebride:

"Do you ladies use Fels-Naptha Soap? I used it last washday, and it was so easy! I just soaked the clothes 30 minutes with Fels-Naptha, and when I came to wash—there wasn't anything to do! The soap has done all the hard part for me! No hard rubbing or boiling. And I got done in less than half the time."

Said Mrs. Experience:

"My dear child we all use Fels-Naptha Soap for washing. I cleaned John's winter suits with it before putting them away this Spring. They look better than when I paid to have them done and I'm saved a big cleaner's bill. Besides, I know the spots won't come back.

"Fels-Naptha has cleaned every speck of grease and dirt away."

Said Mrs. Knowhow:

"This year I saved money by cleaning my carpets and rugs with Fels-Naptha Soap. And they look better than ever too. I cleaned a fair-sized rug in half an hour with scarcely any labor at all. I used a scrubbing brush and Fels-Naptha, then wiped off the soap with a cloth and clear water. The colors in my rugs are bright and clear."

Said Mrs. Prettyhome:

"My painted walls were washed down with Fels-Naptha Soap this Spring. The dirt and smudges just rolled off—but the paint stayed on. And Fels-Naptha didn't hurt the gloss at all. You don't have to hard-rub with Fels-Naptha. That's why it's so good for painted surfaces and the white paint in my house is easy to keep clean since I use Fels-Naptha."

In Fels-Naptha you get the value of the soap and the energy of the Naptha—it's a perfect combination to get rid of dirt. And it does every soap-and-water task thoroughly, easily and quickly.

Bible Picture Contest Answers

Order Your Outfit Immediately

JULY 17

Monday, July 17, 1916, is the final date after which we shall not accept any answers, unless the package of answers bears a postmark showing it was put into the mails on or before midnight of July 17. Answers received before then will not be given any preference. All will be judged after July 17. You can send your answers as late as you please, but not later than July 17.

There is still plenty of time to go over the Contest pictures, pick suitable answers (Bible verses) from "Gems from the Bible," write down those answers in your Reply Book, and submit your Reply Book within the specified time.

If you are not fully prepared, or if you haven't as yet entered the Contest, or if you are debating whether to submit an additional set of answers for yourself, some other member of the family or some one else you know, you should act at once. From the date of this issue of the Christian Herald (June 28) you have only nineteen days' time in which to enter.

NOW

Today, this very moment, is the time for you to order a Contest Outfit; for while you assuredly have until July 17 to submit your set of answers, you cannot examine the Contest pictures and locate answers for them and write those answers in the Reply Book over night. It is also desirable that you proceed leisurely and give yourself the benefit of full observation and judgment. So do not delay. Get your materials together now. Remember that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well. Why shouldn't you strive to earn a large reward? And then there is also the satisfaction of proving the good sense of your choice. Do your best, and start right in.

This is the book

from which contestants select suitable verses for the pictures. It may mean $1,250 to you, and an everlasting spiritual benefit. It is "Gems from the Bible," containing the 2,000 only eligible answers for the Contest pictures.

"Gems from the Bible" is a volume you will treasure. We want you to have it. We also want you to have the Reply Book, in which you can handily write the answers without the necessity of drawing the pictures, which is necessary when answers are not submitted in a Reply Book. Just write your name on the cover and mail in this compact Reply Book as your complete set of answers. And we also want you to have the entire series of Bible Contest pictures, which are obtainable at one cent each, or may all be had as a part of the Outfit. Rules and full instructions are included. All these articles comprise the Outfit and constitute the ideally convenient equipment for taking part in the Contest.

The Contest is wide open. Nobody can get ahead of you. Come on in. Tell your friends to come in.

How to Obtain the Outfit

As for the Outfit described above, we shall not sell it to you, nor can we give it away indiscriminately, but we shall present it to you with any one of the special offers noted below.

Answers Require First Class Postage

Postage at the rate of 2 cents an ounce should be placed on all sets of answers returned. Have package weighed and affix AMPLE POSTAGE TO INSURE SAFE DELIVERY.

Merry Moments

WHEN the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

A WEE BIT SANE. While a certain Scotch minister was conducting religious services in an asylum for the insane, one of the inmates cried out wildly:

"I say, have we got to listen to this?"

The minister, surprised and confused, turned to the keeper and asked:

"Shall I stop speaking?"

The keeper replied:

"No, no; gang along, gang along; that will not happen again. That man only has one lucid moment every seven years."

A Suggestion

The trolley car was crowded,
She couldn't find a seat.
A man in front of her snapped, "Miss,
You're standing on my feet!"
Then sweetly she looked down at him,
The daring little elf,
And said, "Beg pardon, but why don't You stand on them yourself?"

BUT THE QUESTION RETURNS. As the stage-coach careened toward the edge of the cliff, the timid tourist gazed anxiously down at the brawling stream three hundred feet below.

"Do people fall over this precipice often?" she asked.

The driver clucked to his broncos. "No, madam," he returned placidly, "never but once."

THE TEACHER'S REPLY WAS NOT FOR PUBLICATION. Dear Madam: Please do not send Willie on the tree know more because he come home his stockings all torn and his suit all dirty with mud. Suppose he broke his leg or arm. He is poor—we cannot give him new stockings every day and pants. We have to change everything. They said that some man wanted them to pick caterpillars if that man wants caterpillars leave him go pick them himself or let him get older people not like those children. All the mothers are complaining to us to write to you. That man is very smart who ever he is leave him come over to our house and we will speak to him. He has know father and know mother who will buy him clothes. I do not want to see Willie coming with his clothes torn again. We send him to school not to pick bugs. That must be a beautiful man. Everybody is so mad at him for making them climb trees.

Yours truly.

(We omit the signature.)

A MISUNDERSTANDING EASILY CONDONED. "Not long ago," said a certain pastor, "I preached in a church in Virginia, and in the congregation was an aged colored 'mammy,' picturesque in bandana and pinafore. In my discourse I remarked that the commentators did not agree with me. Presently this 'mammy' arose and quietly slipped out of church. After the service I found her standing outside the door with a bag in her hand, and this she presented to me, saying, 'I heard yo' say de common 'taters don' agree wid yo', an' I hurried home to git yo' some sweet Virginny yams.'"

IN AGREEMENT AT LAST Silas fled before his irate wife, and seeking the first shelter that presented itself crept under the bed, from whence, after a short time, he peered cautiously out.

Seeing his wife standing near by with an upraised broom, he shouted:

"Mirandy, I think it's about time somebody was boss in this house."

WHERE EMULATION STOPPED. A woman said to a little boy with his hair bobbed in his neck: "Franklyn, when are you going to have your hair cut like papa's?"

"I don't want my hair cut like papa's," he replied, "with a hole in the top."

AT a temperance meeting in England recently, Mr. Gerald France, M. P., read the following letter sent by Khama, the African chief, to the administrator and deputy-commissioner of Bechuanaland on the subject of a concession for the sale of liquor which a British firm was seeking: "I fear Lo Bengula less than I fear brandy. I fought with Lo Bengula when he had his father's great warriors from Natal, and drove him back, and he never came again, and God, who helped me then, would help me again. Lo Bengula never gives me a sleepless night. But to fight against drink is to fight against demons and not against men. I dread the white men's drink more than all the assegais of the Matabele, which kill men's bodies and it is quickly over, but drink puts devils into men and destroys both their souls and their bodies forever. Its wounds never heal. I pray you never to ask me to open even a little door to the drink."

The book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" received, and I am more than pleased with it. It will be very helpful to me in my Bible study, which is a comfort.

Why Light Bodied Oil Should Not Be Used In a Ford

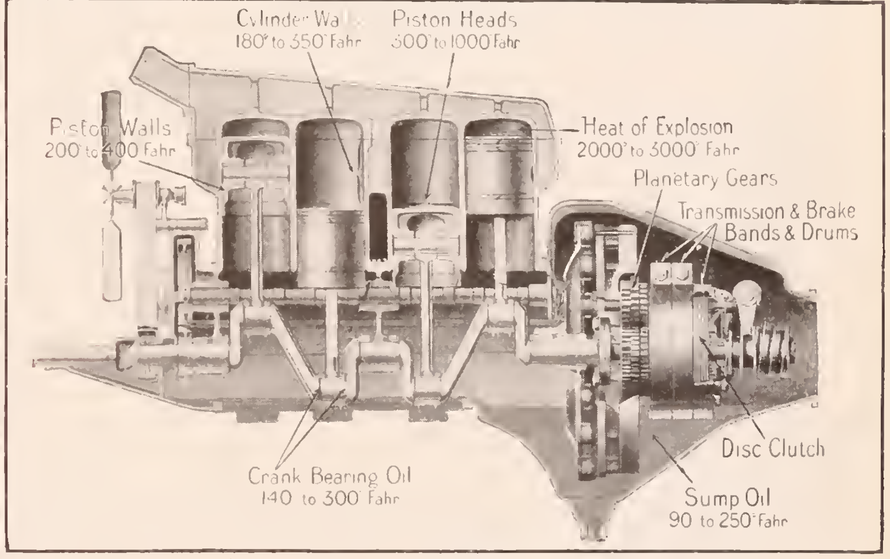
Unlike any other automobile, the Ford engine parts are all enclosed with the planetary transmission gears and bands, disc clutch and service brake.

One oil must lubricate three entirely different mechanisms—the engine, transmission and clutch parts, as shown below.

For the cylinders, the oil must be heavy enough to resist intense heat, avoid boiling the water and deposit least carbon.

For the transmission gears, the oil should be extra heavy to cushion the gears and prevent noise and wear.

For the clutch, the oil should be light enough to prevent danger to the operator from "dragging," especially when starting the motor in cold weather.



Cylinder Walls 180° to 350° Fahr
Piston Heads 300° to 1000° Fahr
Piston Walls 200° to 400° Fahr
Heat of Explosion 2000° to 3000° Fahr
Planetary Gears
Transmission & Brake Bands & Drums
Disc Clutch
Crank Bearing Oil 140 to 300° Fahr
Sump Oil 90 to 250° Fahr

THE INSIDE OF THE FORD MOTOR

These three different conditions demand a compromise in the body of the one oil used.

Most oil companies recommend an extremely light bodied oil to avoid clutch "dragging," thus sacrificing proper lubrication of engine and transmission.

We, to the contrary, recommend Veedol Medium which has about the same body as the average motor oil sold as "Heavy."

After years of scientific investigation, thousands of road tests and the use of Pennsylvania Crude Oil in its manufacture, we have developed Veedol Medium—the one lubricant that will most satisfactorily lubricate the engine, transmission and clutch, of the Ford power plant.

Buy a five gallon can of Veedol Medium, drain out all old oil and sediment from crank case—fill with kerosene—run thirty seconds to cleanse thoroughly—drain out kerosene, then refill with Veedol Medium and prove these statements. We guarantee you perfect satisfaction.

FREE: New 88 page Veedol Book telling all about manufacturing and testing of oils and their use in automobiles, tractors and gas engines.

Thousands of garages and dealers carry Veedol. If your dealer does not, write to us.

"JUST DAVID"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by $1.00. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.00.

A Church of Revolutionary Days

ONE of the most interesting historic places to visit, on the outskirts of New York City, is St. Paul's Church, Eastchester, now within the boundary of the city of Mount Vernon. Over two hundred years ago, in 1692, was built the first church, a little frame structure. About 1760 the present stone building was begun, and was completed in 1765.

With the occupation of New York by the British in those revolutionary days, the invading army overran the country, and the church was made use of by the British as a hospital, heated by wood taken, piece by piece, from the old building. Thus the new building became a tomb for the old, and to this day the ashes of the old church remain beneath. With the advent of the patriot army, and the engagement at White Plains, the tide of battle swept about this peaceful edifice. Even now, holes in the walls and scars inflicted by the artillery of Washington can be discerned.

For four years after peace was declared, the present edifice was used for a courthouse. It was in this building that a man accused of horse stealing was defended by Aaron Burr, but was found guilty and sentenced to be hanged.

The graveyard surrounding the old church holds the remains of many revolutionary soldiers and patriots, as the tombstones testify. At the south side of the grounds is a sand pit, where many Hessian soldiers were buried, who died in the church when it was used as a hospital.

In the belfry, and still in use every Sunday, is a bell presented to the church in 1758. This bell, along with the ancient Bible and prayer-book, was buried for safe-keeping during the Revolution, and later restored to use, the prayer-book being altered to suit changed conditions of government, by strips of paper and red stickers pasted over the names of British royalty and other names and terms no longer to be considered in American national prayers. For odd periods of time and various reasons, both civil and religious, the church was not always open for divine service, but since 1837 it has been used regularly.

On the Fourth of July morning patriotic service is held annually, inaugurated in 1893 by the late Dr. Coffey, for nearly sixty years rector of St. Paul's. This service is held on the old church green, and while the names of the signers of the Declaration of Independence are read, their descendants present stand up and are acknowledged with applause. At the conclusion of the service the "Star-Spangled Banner" is sung, while from the belfry thirteen strokes peal out from the famous old bell, in honor of the original states; then the many graves of soldiers and patriots in the churchyard, even the grave of the Hessian soldiers, are adorned with "Old Glory."

THE wealth of inspiration offered at the Northfield Conference meetings breathes the true fresh-air spirit. The gatherings take place in a great sunny auditorium, cheerful in its light-toned woodwork.

The various phases of this summer's activity are:

Bible Studies and Special Addresses at the Northfield Schools and Conferences, May 1 to September 30.

Camp Northfield Encampment, June 22 to September 1.

Student Conference (Y. M. C. A.), June 23 to July 2.

Young Women's Conference (Division 2), July 5-12.

Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies, July 14-21.

Mount Hermon Commencement and Celebration of Thirty-fifth Anniversary, July 15-18.

Women's Summer School of Home Missions of the East, July 21-28.

Summer School for Sunday School Workers, July 22-29.

General Conference of Christian Workers, August 4-20.

THE Union Collegiate Church of Corona, L. I., on June 2 observed in one reception the thirty-fifth year of the pastorate of the Rev. W. J. Peck and the silver anniversary of the pastor and his wife. During this long pastorate Dr. Peck has baptized 1,340 persons, and has taken 782 into the church. Three young men have gone from the church into the ministry, and the Sunday school enrolment is now 1,400.

THE Wesleyan Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene at Providence, R. I., began revival services on June 4.

THE Board Walk Church at Atlantic City, N. J., Rev. R. A. Elwood, minister, opened for its eighth season the first Sunday in June. Services are held in the Bijou Theater on the Board Walk each Sunday at 10:45. A half-hour organ recital precedes each service.

GOLDEN WEDDING. Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Bradshaw of Melvin, Mich., for many years members of the Christian Herald Family, and both more than eighty years of age, celebrated their golden wedding on April 10, 1916.

THE PATH OF GLORY

FLAGS snap briskly in the breeze. Bands play. All is inspiriting bustle.
The king comes.
He decorates these stalwart men with medals.
He reaches one who, when his captain fell, led the company on to victory.
A trench, a machine gun and thirty dead had been the spoils.
This medal marked his country's approval.

* * * * *

IN an alien village a mother sat weeping.
Her husband had been one of those luckless defenders of that captured trench.
Her baby, finding a beautiful flower, brought it for her approval.
Rousing from her grief, she caught up the baby, crushing it to her breast.
Unnoticed, the flower dropped to the floor.

THERE is no condition of climate, no change of occupation, no manner of living that makes Ivory Soap less indispensable.

In the frozen North as in the sunny South its mildness and purity are needed so that tender skins may be washed without irritation.

For those who do rough work as for those whose hands show only the soil of play, its soft, thick, bubbling lather produces the thorough cleanness desired.

In the mining cabin as in the luxurious home, its safety and efficiency make its scope of work unlimited and enable it to answer every need.

The exclusive Ivory features give it a permanent and universal appeal. They are the qualities that everybody wants, no matter how, when or where soap is used.

How Patsey Went to Mont-Lawn

By ELEANOR H. PORTER, Author of "Pollyanna"

THEY were so alike, yet so different. Both had wealth, yith, and health. Both hl beauty, of a sort. Tere the resemblance eled. Elizabeth Harmn, in her modish suit and handsome furs, showed a discontented, frful face with drooping mouth and lack-luster eyes. Mary Carleton, iner simple blue gown and white collar and cuffs, showed a face that faly glowed with the joy of living.

At college the two girls had been classmates and warm friends. Upon gduation, Mary (as Elizabeth termed it) had "gone in for settlement wk"—a most unaccountable move, from Elizabeth's standpoint.

But, then, you won't keep it up long—you'll see!" Elizabeth had sffed merrily, as she betook herself and her frills and finery to the sshore for the summer.

'he summer passed, however, and winter came; and Mary still "kept itp." It was March now; and, for the half-dozenth time, Elizabh had descended upon the little East Side settlement to ronstrate with her friend.

But I don't see how you stand it," she declared a last, looking scornfully about her "—so horrid a dirty!"

I love it," laughed the other. "Besi·s, it's neither horrid nor dirty—in he!" she corrected with emphasis.

But it is outside."

Exactly! That's why we're he," smiled the little settlement wker, significantly. "We're trng to show them how nice itould be if they'd be clean—ase are."

But I should think you'd di doing it—such a dismal, dury existence! And just thk--all this summer and wter! Such a lot of yr time wasted, and just wn you're young and cld enjoy things!"

Wasted! Enjoy things!"

n odd look came to Mry's face. Her eyes we on the discontented cntenance of her friend. Sl hesitated, opened her li again, then closed thn with an expressive lite shrug of her shoulde, which Elizabeth, her ey turned moodily tod the window, did not se here was a moment's silnce; then, lightly, Mary said:

Oh, never mind about me. Tell me alt yourself. What have you been dg?"

lizabeth sighed and raised her eyebrows in bd weariness.

Oh, the same old stupid things—teas, dinners, daes, and receptions—then begin all over again to dawdle, dae, and dine! I'm sick to death of them. Why can't they get uomething different?—something new?"

ary gave a sudden amused laugh.

Oh, Betty, Betty!" she challenged. "Here, by your own acunt, you're 'sick to death' of it all, yet you want me to—" She stopped short. A small girl on crutches had flung wi the door.

Miss Mary, Miss Mary, they said you was in here, an' ter coe right in. An' I did."

Yes, Susie. What is it, dear?"

he small girl hurried forward, her crutches tapping sharply against th bare floor. Her face was thin and pale, though just now alight with eagerness. She wore a ragged little jacket over a faded and tattered pink calico dress, obviously outgrown. Her hands were bare, and red with the cold. As she flung herself, arms outstretched, upon her "Miss Mary," Elizabeth Harmon drew back with a shuddering "Oh, Mary, how can you?"

But Mary did not seem to have heard. With infinite tenderness she rescued the crutches from a fall, and placed a sympathetic arm about the child's quivering little body.

"Yes, Susie, what is it?" she said again.

"Miss Mary, Rosie Polenski was a-tellin' of me—an' is it true?—'bout a place called Mount-Lawn, where there's grass an' trees that's free ter walk on, an' swings an' things ter eat till ye jest can't eat no more, an' not jest once, but ev'ry day, three times a day, fur days an' days. An' they're a-goin' ter run it again this summer? Say, Miss Mary, is that all honest-Injin so, or was Rosie jest a-gassin' of me?"

"No, she was telling you the truth," smiled Miss Mary. "There is such a place—Mont-Lawn. But"— her face grew a little troubled—"we're sending now all we can from here, and I'm afraid— Was it that you wanted to go, if there were a chance?"

"Oh, no! Oh, 'course I wants ter go," amended Susie, in a matter-of-course tone; "but 'twan't me I was a-thinkin' of, an' 'course I couldn't go, anyway, on account o' bein' lame, so. They wouldn't want no lame kids, 'tain't likely. An' besides, I don't really need it, anyhow, you know, 'cause I've got a back yard and two geraniums. It's Patsey McGuire. It's him I was wantin' ter go; an' I'm goin' ter pay. Rosie says rich folks does pay ter have 'em go. Patsey hain't got anythin', not even a winder, where he lives."

"No window!"

"Not a real winder, what looks ontdoors, I mean. An' he's sick—Patsey is. An' he talks all the time 'bout trees an' grass ter walk on. Ye see, he went once to a place where they had 'em, fur jest a day. An' bein' sick so, now, it seems as if he jest couldn't stop talkin' 'bout 'em, an' wantin' 'em. An' Rosie told me that her ma told her that the horspitul doctor said he'd die—Patsey would—if he couldn't get ter go inter the country this summer. An' Rosie says that that 'ere Mount-Lawn is country. Is it, Miss Mary?"

"Yes, dear. It's very beautiful country."

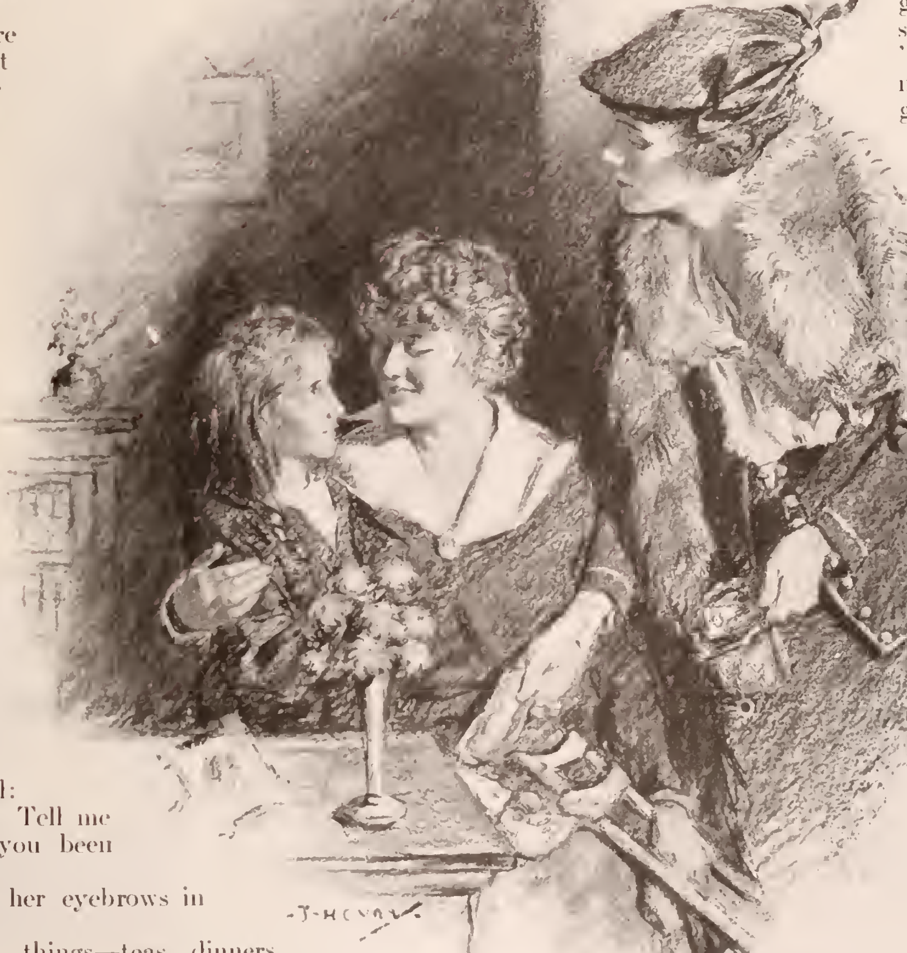
Susie drew a long breath.

"Then that's all right. Now there's only left jest gettin' him there. Rosie says it costs three dollars, an' he can stay ten days, an' the nights, too. Is that so?"

"Yes."

"Well!" Susie drew another long sigh, and puckered her face into an anxious frown. "That's where it's goin' ter be bad—'bout the money, ye see. I hain't got enough."

With a dextrous twist she thrust her right hand into a large patch pocket of turkey-red cloth set on her tiny pink skirt, and brought out a handful of pennies, dimes and nickels.



With shaking hands she emptied the gold mesh bag

"Why, Susie, where in the world did you get all this?" cried Miss Mary, as the jingling coins were dropped into her lap.

Susie's pinched little face grew suddenly a bit wistful.

"Well, ye see, I—I've been savin' of 'em, oh, fur years an' years, I reckon. Some of 'em's earned, an' some of 'em's jest give ter me. Ye see, Rosie she told me onct there was a big doctor what could—could fix legs like mine—make 'em go, ye know. An' I—I was plannin' how, some day, when I got enough saved up ter pay, maybe he'd fix mine. But—" The childish voice faltered and almost broke; then went on with renewed strength: "But—I ain't a-goin' ter do that now. 'Twould take too long, anyhow, an' Patsey needs it right now, or he'll die. So I'd ruther use it ter buy him the country. But there ain't enough, even then. Rosie, she counted it. There's only one dollar an' eighty-seven cents. But——"

The little girl paused for breath, and thrust her hand again into her capacious pocket. This time she carefully pulled out three small squares of perforated cardboard, such as is used in kindergarten work, fantastically decorated with red and blue worsted.

"There," she announced, as she triumphantly spread the squares in Miss Mary's lap, "here's my pitshers, what I done in school, ye know. An' I thought—I thought, maybe I'd—I'd sell 'em." The quivering crescendo in which these words were uttered plainly testified to the magnitude of the renunciation.

"Sell them, my dear!" murmured Miss Mary, faintly.

"Yes. Rosie says folks—rich folks—does buy pitshers to put in their houses, jest ter look at; an' these are so pretty ter look at! An'——" But Miss Mary interrupted.

"Oh, but, my dear," she remonstrated gently, her eyes distressed and sympathetic, "I'm afraid—I'm sure—that is, I don't see how you can sell them; for——"

"Yes, I know—an' I didn't neither," interposed Susie, tremulously, blinking the tears off her long lashes. "It seemed at first as if I jest couldn't sell 'em. They've been so pretty, up on the shelf there down home. An' such lots o' comp'ny, too. Why, sometimes, seems as if they jest talked to me! That little bit o' red in the middle o' that one there does talk. It says 'Hullo, Susie,' to me ev'ry time I come home. An' I—I hated ter see 'em go. Then I thought of Patsey, an' I said they've jest got ter go. So I bringed 'em terday, fur you ter sell, an' pay the rest o' that three dollars fur the country fur Patsey."

Miss Mary caught her breath a bit convulsively. She threw a swift glance at Elizabeth; but that young woman was looking quite the other way, with her face averted.

"I know; but, my dear," began Miss Mary, helplessly. "I'm afraid nobody will buy them. Nobody will want them for——"

THERE was a sudden movement, and a half-sobbing cry. The next moment the nonplussed little settlement worker found herself gazing into the angry eyes of a girl in handsome furs and a modish suit.

"Mary Carleton, how can you sit there," the girl was demanding sharply, "and tell that blessed child that nobody wants those—those——"

Mary's eyes flew wide open.

"But, my dear Elizabeth, you know perfectly well that nobody would buy——"

"I don't know any such thing," flamed Elizabeth, hotly. "In fact, I—I want them myself. Here!" With shaking hands she pulled a gold-mesh bag from her muff and emptied its contents into Mary's astonished lap. "I'll show you somebody wants them. Oh, no, I don't want to take them," she went on hurriedly, as Susie, with a joyous cry, picked up the squares of cardboard and held them out. "I don't want——" She stopped abruptly at the dismayed look that came to the little girl's face. Then, suddenly, a new excitement came to her own. "Yes, I do, too," she cried joyously. "Here, let me have them. I'll sell them myself over again. You see if I don't! I'll take them to our fair this afternoon. I'll show you whether anybody wants those—those—blessed 'pitshers' or not!"

And before the dumfounded Miss Mary or the overjoyed Susie could collect their wits, she was gone.

Perhaps it was the novelty of the thing. Perhaps it was that Miss Elizabeth Harmon possessed a heart and had suddenly discovered it. Perhaps it was merely the natural response of blasé weariness to anything that promised excitement. Whatever it was, Elizabeth, with an enthusiasm that swept everything before it, plunged into the carrying-out of her plans.

THUS it happened that the very select and fashionable gathering at the St. Mark's Bazaar that afternoon found themselves peering through their amazed lorgnettes at three small, slightly soiled squares of perforated cardboard, embroidered in fantastic scrawls of red and blue worsted, and listening to a flushed-faced, starry-eyed young woman who was telling them about a little crippled girl who didn't need the country, because she had two geraniums and a back yard, but who had a little sick friend, Patsey, for whom she was desiring to buy three dollars' worth of country in the shape of a ten days' visit to Mont-Lawn. To accomplish which end she had brought all her savings and earnings (amounting to one dollar and eighty-seven cents and hitherto designed to purchase the services of a great doctor who could make her own legs go), together with these three pieces of cardboard, which were now offered for sale. They learned, also, how very precious indeed these three "pitshers" were down in a dingy East Side te ment.

Miss Elizabeth Harmon must have told her s y well, for she made swift and successful sales. So ea r, indeed, were the would-be purchasers that the ex sive and fashionable St. Mark's Bazaar prom y turned itself into a wildly enthusiastic auction-ro n, with the bidding fast and furious, until the f al "going, going, gone" brought into Miss Harm 's hands an unbelievable harvest of crisp bills d shining gold. Thus three bits of perforated cardb d became the amazing property, respectively, of J n Peabody, banker; Mrs. Reginald Raymond, c woman; and Carl Ferris, college undergraduate.

Nor was this the end. For at a certain direct 's meeting the next morning, squarely in the middle a long mahogany table, lay a small piece of embr ered cardboard, while a somewhat embarrassed, it very much in earnest, bald-headed man sidetra d a half-million-dollar "deal" while he attempte o tell a group of grizzled business men the story a little crippled girl who had legs that didn't go.

That same day, at the city's most exclu e Woman's Club, lifted high in a daintily-gloved h d, was another of Susie's "pitshers," while, to e accompaniment of the rustle of silks and the flutt of sympathetic handkerchiefs, was told once more e story of the little girl who, having two geraniums d a back yard, did not need the country.

And yet again that same day, at a college sprea a dozen laughing youths grew suddenly strangely q t, and looked anywhere but into one another's face as there was passed from hand to hand a tiny squa of embroidered cardboard with a bit of flaming red at meant "Hullo" to a little crippled girl.

Nor yet again was this the end; for March wa ot a week older before all three of Susie's bel ed "pitshers" were back in Miss Mary's ama d, rejoicing hands, together with another hoard of sp bills and shining gold brought by an embarra ed banker, a teary-eyed clubwoman, and a stud ly nonchalant college youth.

OF course, Patsey went to Mont-Lawn, whe he time came, and of course Susie went with n. Everybody expected that. Of course, too, in all at treasure of gold and greenbacks there was enoug to "buy" not only the country for Patsey, but he services of the great doctor who some day, he h d, would be able to make Susie's little legs "go."

All this was quite as was to be expected. But ere remained yet one feature that was a surpris all around; for, before many months had passed, E abeth Harmon's friends, with lifted hands and sho ed voices, had said, one to another:

"Did you know?—Betty Harmon has gone to settlement work—Betty!"

But Miss Mary—and Elizabeth herself—s ed content.

The Mexican Situation

PRESIDENT WILSON has said the last word to General Carranza. On June 20 Secretary of State Lansing handed to the representative of Carranza at Washington the final answer of the United States government to Carranza's demand for the withdrawal of the American punitive expedition. It is not necessary, nor have we room here, to give the full text of the note. The note calls the attention of Carranza to his failure to take any effective means to apprehend or to punish the perpetrators of outrages upon American territory, and calls attention also to the failure of the Carranza government to keep the agreement made by Generals Scott and Obregon at El Paso. The note warns Carranza that his threat "to appeal to arms unless the American troops are immediately retired" would, if carried out, be followed by grave consequences, and that the refusal of the United States to withdraw its troops will stand as long as their presence in Mexico is the only efficient means of protecting American lives and homes. The President has made it plain that Carranza can take his choice. If he wishes war, he may succeed in forcing it. If he wishes peace, there is every reason to believe that peace may be kept between the two nations and that eventually order may be restored along the border.

General Frederick Funston

By special resolution, immediately following the President's call of June 18, Congress prepared to put in force the new Hay Army Bill under which the President is empowered to use the National Guard as a part of the Federal army at home or abroad; wherever the need may be.

Reports from Mexico show that the whole of northern Mexico is seething with anti-American feeling engendered by the inflammatory utterances of Carranzista officers and officials. It is not known just how many Mexican troops are within striking distance of the 11,000 men under General Pershing, at Namiquipa, but reports indicate that there are between thirty and forty thousand. There are probably ten thousand more, possibly as many as 20,000, in other parts of northern Mexico in positions to offer resistance to American troops. The United States now has along the border, on the American side, 35,000 Federal soldiers, and about 5,000 National Guardsmen of Texas, New Mexico and Arizona. This force has proven insufficient to prevent raids at night upon ranches and towns near the border, for the line which they must guard is about 1,500 miles long. Actual trouble, however, is confined to a stretch of about 300 miles. Troops of the National Guard now mobilizing are expected to number about 100,000 when finally ready to be mustered into the Federal service. At present most of the units are short of men or lacking in some items of equipment, such as horses for the artillery, and camp equipment. The total strength of the National Guard including those units not at present called to the colors, and also the naval militia and the coast guard, is about 135,000 men. But if all the units were enlisted to war strength, the National Guard would furnish a force of about 200,000. The United States army under the new Hay Army Bill, when recruited to full strength, would be in the neighborhood of 240,000 men. These two authorized arms of the service would therefore give the United States government an initial force of about 450,000 men.

The Federal army at present, however, includes less than 100,000 men of all arms, of whom o a little over 40,000 men are available for active se ce, the rest being required for the ordinary duti of administration in Hawaii, the Philippines, the C nal Zone, Alaska, caragua and the I nd of Santo Doming .

The Indian as a Make-Good

By MABEL POWERS, "Yeh-sen-noh-wehs"

ARE the Indians making good? Are they contributing their share to the world's work? Are they producing leaders? I wish to reply by stating what some Iroquois are doing in modern industrial and professional lif I also wish to say that if some are not acquiring th vork habit, the failure is not theirs but the white ma's.

e have with us a deeply wronged and tragically m nderstood people. A people robbed of their na ral heritage, a people without a country, humili- at in spirit, betrayed in faith, deprived of their ec omic freedom and growth, and, last and most inf nous of all, a people denied the right to be th iselves. Yet in a comparatively short time we fir this race emerging from the wreck and confusion of e past, rekindling the fires of hope, mastering the ne conditions that confront them, making good to y.

ne Iroquois have always been producers. In their pr itive days they cultivated and produced all things ne ful for life. Economic conditions were determined by nvironment. Hunting and fishing were the chief ac ities of men, agriculture and weaving those of th vomen. During their Golden Age—from 1650 to 17—the Iroquois were not only great hunters and as te statesmen. but agriculturists and builders. Tl journals of Sullivan and his officers refer many tir s to the remarkable fields of grain and orchards of uit found in the Genesee Val- le nd lake regions. Lieutenant Be ty writes of destroying one hu lred and fifty acres of the fin t corn he ever saw, sixteen an eighteen feet high, with cobs a f t and a half in length, also of th quantities of beans, pumpki squash, cucumbers, waterm ns, carrots, and other vegeta s the Indians were growing. Su van himself reports that a n erate estimate of peaches and ap es destroyed by his army w d reach 160,000 bushels. This pe le were also living in comfo ble frame houses.

it splendid as was their adva ement along these lines, the Ir uois' greatest contribution wa spiritual. The genius of the ra expressed in their social orga sm and nature idealism will fo er live. It matters not wh her a single noble red man ex s today. He once lived and ha made his contribution. This co ribution has permanent and su ival value. We have it toda It is the motive power of the B Scouts, the Camp Fire Girls, th Woodcraft Leagues, and all m ements to recover the spirit and magic of the gr t out-of-doors.

ad the white race that destroyed the civilization of e Iroquois had the intelligence to understand the ge us of the Indian, we might have had world federation today. It has recently been discovered by three scientists, two of whom are Iroquois, that this people possessed a constitution of one hundred and twenty-eight definite articles, recorded mostly on wampum belts. This constitution provided for a democracy of far greater justice, equality, and fraternity than has ever been evolved by any of the so-called civilized nations. It is true that this social ideal ended with the tribe; did not include mankind; but it furnished a rational working basis for world federation.

Chief Grant Mount Pleasant and his steed

SUCH blood as that which flowed in Iroquois veins two centuries ago cannot be exterminated by even two hundred years of persecution. It has gotten mixed in many instances with some pretty pale, thin stuff, but Iroquois red corpuscles are yet in evidence.

A Modern Iroquois Girl

Foremost among the "Red Bloods" are the Parkers—father and son. They come of a line of distinguished ancestors, of the Seneca tribe of the Iroquois stock. Frederick E. Parker, the father, is a nephew of General Ely Parker. Grant's military secretary and the co-worker of Lewis H. Morgan. He is a man of fine presence and attainments. A resident of White Plains, N. Y., he has been a potent factor for clean government and social reform in his community. Mr. Parker holds the responsible position of statistician in the department of revenue of the New York Central Railroad, having charge of all offices, including more than a thousand agents, between Chicago and New York.

The son, Arthur C. Parker, a brilliant young archeologist, since his appointment to the New York State Museum has practically created a new Archeological Museum. He is a writer of note, editor-general of the American Indian Magazine, a member of the American Ethnological and Sociological Societies, the 1916 medalist of Chicago University for Indian research, and one of the ten American archeologists appointed to the Pan-American Scientific Congress. Any race that can produce men of these measurements at thirty-five years may well be proud.

There are many skilled machinists and telegraph operators of Iroquois blood. Leander Gansworth, a Tuscarora, is foreman of a large printing plant in Davenport, Iowa, and General Secretary of the Typographical Union of Iowa. Chapman Skenandoah, an Onondaga, is chief engineer of the battleship New York.

One of the finest types of the race is a skilled motor assembler, Charles Doxon, an Onondaga, employed in Syracuse. Born in abject reservation poverty, early orphaned, he was taught by a grandfather to beware of the white man and his ways, especially to watch out for the devil secreted between the covers of a printed book. The hardships suffered and difficulties overcome by this youth in achieving training and economic independence fell nothing short of the heroic. At eighteen he could not speak, read, or write English. Yet he worked his way through Hampton, and became an expert engineer and machinist. Later he taught other Indians the work habit, to know with him the joy that comes to the man who knows how. Mr. Doxon is not only an assembler of motors, but of his people. He is a friction eliminator, a harmonizer. He believes in "Get Together Clubs," and is thoroughly respected and loved. A constructive sociologist, he sees in industrial education the key to the freedom of his race, and the need of industrial schools on each reservation, not only training the young but cooperating with the people.

FROM the time the Iroquois raised their lodge poles in the primeval forest, they have loved to build. Excellent carpenters are found on all reservations. A few are skilled in wood-carving and decorative work. One Seneca has helped to build some millionaire homes on Fifth Avenue, New York. He is Albert Parker, a structural engineer. One Tuscarora has become an international figure, namely,

MISSOURI Has Been Shown. The Billy Sunday meetings in Kansas City, Mo., ended on June 18. More than 13,000 persons hit the trail during the meetings. Mr. Sunday goes from Kansas City to Boston. The Ministerial Alliance of Greater Kansas City continued the evangelistic work in their several churches, and conducted an intensive campaign to increase the membership in all Bible and Sunday school classes. All the forces for Christ in Kansas City were united in a celebration of the Lord's Supper in all the churches on Sunday, July 2: Sunday, June 25, and Sunday, July 2, being observed as "Join the Church" Sundays.

Doctors Would Bar Drunkards. At the annual convention of the American Medical Association in Detroit the Committee of Industrial Sanitation declared in its report that "the final solution of the problem of drunkenness rests with the intelligent employer who refuses employment to the alcoholic."

To Combat Speeditis. New York City has recently opened a traffic court, which is to have jurisdiction over breaches of the traffic regulations. The problem of traffic in Manhattan Borough arises from the congestion due to the use of the streets by a resident population of 2,500,000, to which is added a million persons who come into the borough on every business day. In the New York district there are registered 103,000 motor vehicles and 13,000 horse-drawn vehicles. Horse-drawn vehicles not used for business are not registered. The problem is to keep all these vehicles and pedestrians moving expeditiously with the minimum of interference and accident. The court is expected to simplify the enforcement of the traffic ordinance. The chief magistrate in opening the court said: "In the language of the medical profession, we are going to hold daily here a clinic for the prevalent disease of 'speeditis.'"

Reef Takes Lives. On June 14 the steamer Bear from Portland to San Francisco, off her course in a dense fog, was wrecked near Sugarloaf Rock on the northern California coast. One hundred and sixty-eight survivors of the passengers and crew, many of them injured, were landed at Eureka and Capetown, Calif. Twenty-four hours after the wreck five persons were known to have been killed and forty-two were still missing. Two life-boats were capsized in the heavy seas.

Japan Will Control the Pacific. It was announced recently that the International Mercantile Marine Company, which bought for $2,000,000, from the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, the Pacific liners Siberia and Korea, had resold the steamers to the Toyo Kisen Kaisha Steamship Company of Japan for $4,000,000. Japanese shipyards are reported to be working at high pressure to produce mercantile vessels for the trans-Pacific and the Asiatic coastwise trades. It was reported in the middle of June that the Midvale Steel Company had sold 10,000 tons of steel plates, and had given an option on 30,000 additional tons, to buyers representing Japanese shipyards, the price paid being more than double the quotations of two years ago. American restrictive laws are said to make it impossible for American ships to compete with Japanese vessels operating under the extremely favorable laws of Japan.

A Splint for a Splinter. A citizen of New York crossing Chatham Square one night recently caught the foot of an artificial limb in the car track, with serious damage to the limb. He leaned against an elevated railroad pillar and called to a passing patrolman that he had broken his leg. Before he could explain the nature of the injury, the patrolman had called an ambulance, which rushed up, bundled in the injured party and hurried him to the operating-table at the hospital. But there the citizen explained to the surgeon that the leg being wooden required the services of a screwdriver rather than a scalpel, and the surgeon resigned in favor of a carpenter.

Three Quarters of a Billion in Insurance. According to figures made public June 21, the 200 regular life insurance companies of the United States and Canada paid out to policyholders in 1915 the sum of $733,700,000; $451,300,000 was paid in death claims, matured endowments, and other benefits, and $282,400,000 was paid in premium savings, cash value of surrendered policies, and to beneficiaries under policies issued in foreign countries. During the year the amount of the money paid on surrendered values has decreased 70 per cent. and the amount loaned on policies 50 per cent. Total payments exceeded those of 1914 by $47,000,000.

merican consuls in Mexico, immediately it ecame known that the American reply to ranza's latest note would be an absolute r sal of his demands, began to arrange for t passage out of Mexico of Americans in t country. It is not known definitely how m y Americans are still in Mexico, but it is p able that aside from twelve or fifteen h dred in Mexico City there are less than 5 0 Americans in the various states of the s hern Republic, and these have been reach- i the border by various routes with only oc- c onal opposition from the Carranza author- it . On June 19 Carranza addressed a body o tudents in Mexico City and again repeated h determination that American troops s ld not again cross the border. He also a n reiterated his desire for peace.

n June 18 a landing party from the U. S. boat Annapolis was attacked by the xican shore guard at the Pacific port of atlan. The fire was returned. Boat- s in's mate I. M. Laughter was seriously w nded and several Mexicans were hit. o American officers were arrested by the xicans and later released. On June 20 etary Daniels sent a request to Congress f authority to increase the personnel of the n y by 20,700 men, with discretionary au- t ity to add another 13,000. If both ad- d ons were made, the personnel of the navy w ld reach 87,000 men, a sufficient number t put in active service every vessel of the erican navy now in service or in reserve, c out of commission but seaworthy. The retary also requested that the new navy l provide four dreadnoughts in addition to t units already authorized. On the 21st. v d reached El Paso through Mexican sources t a clash between a patrol of General shing's troops—a detachment of the th Cavalry (colored)—and Carranza liers had occured near Carrizal, nine miles thwest of Villa Ahumada, Mexican field dquarters in northern Chihuahua. Gen- Felix Gomez, in command of the Car- za troops, was killed. Twelve American t pers were reported killed, and seventeen t en prisoners and interned at Chihauhua y. Captain Charles T Boyd and First ut. Henry R. Adair were killed. The Mex- i loss is given as in the neighborhood of t score. Reports disagree as to the manner he clash, Mexicans charging that the Amer- s fired upon the bearer of a flag of truce, ile other reports charge that the Mexicans de use of the flag of truce to decoy the ericans into a position where they could be ed by machine-gun fire. The American force of about 91 men fought a force of 800 Mexicans for five hours, and then the survivors retreated across the desert, taking their wounded with them. An official report from General Pershing, on June 23, confirmed the report of Mexican treachery.

The Mexican garrison at Juarez opposite El Paso evacuated the town on June 22, many civilians going with the troops. General Bell ordered a brigade of American troops held in readiness to occupy the town which was left without a government.

Secretary Lansing, on June 22, sent to the diplomatic representatives of all the South and Central American nations an identical note enclosing a copy of the note of June 20 to Carranza and disclaiming any purpose of intervention in Mexico, stating that "Hostilities, in short, would be simply a state of international war, without purpose on the part of the United States other than to end the conditions which menace our national peace and the safety of our citizens." The Carranza government is conducting throughout Latin-America a vigorous propaganda to make it appear that the United States is the aggressor and is forcing a war of conquest on Mexico with the ultimate object of extending its boundaries to the Panama Canal. The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

SINCE the lapse of time has now been sufficient to develop the Russian offensive against the Austro-Germans so as to enable us to appreciate with some degree of clearness its strategy and objectives, and to estimate its chances of realizing its purpose, it seems appropriate to review the events of the past few weeks.

General Brussiloff, the Russian commander in south Russia and Galicia, on June 2 found his forces occupying a line beginning at Czartorysk and running thence south a couple of miles to the east of Kolki on the west bank of the Styr River, thence running about five miles to eastward of Olyka, whence the line made a short curve to the west and then curved east again and, rounding the fortress of Dubno, then in Austrian hands, ran almost due south to the eastern outskirts of Alexsinice, on the northern border of Galicia, the town itself being a sort of No-Man's Land between the Russian and Austrian battle lines to the east and west respectively.

From the Galician border the Russian line ran slightly southwest to the head of the Strypa River, which runs roughly south and north until its junction with the Dniester at Koszylowce. Thence the Russian line turned more to the southeast, following the northern bank of the Dniester to a point a little to the east of Zaleszczki, and thence, turning more directly south, ran across country to a point on the northern bank of the Pruth River, almost directly opposite Czernowitz, Bukowina, which northern bank it then followed more or less closely to the Rumanian border.

For the past five or six months Russia has been preparing fresh forces of men, and importing additional supplies of ammunition, projectiles and military stores, with a view of initiating an offensive on some point of her long battle line in the early summer; and this offensive, it was finally decided, should be delivered by General Brussiloff, who was accordingly during the month of May reinforced very heavily with both men and munitions of war.

The two objectives of this offensive were, as a glance at a map will show, Kovel in Volhynia and Lemberg in Galicia. Kovel is an important railroad center, and its possession and the control of the railroad radiating from it would most seriously embarrass the Teutonic lines of communication as far north as Prinsk, and at the same time a Russian capture of that town would drive a wedge between the Teutons operating in Poland and southern Russia and those operating in eastern Galicia, which might have serious consequences to both forces.

The other objective was Lemberg, Galicia, a town which the Russians are very anxious to possess, as, aside from its strategic importance, both this town and indeed the whole of eastern Galicia are most largely populated by the same people as those who inhabit the adjoining Russian province of Volhynia. The people of this race, however, who inhabit eastern Galicia are out of sympathy with the Russian government, principally on account of the religious persecution, as they state, of their brethren on the northern side of the frontier. One result of this feeling has been a growing friction between these inhabitants of eastern Galicia and the Russian government, which state of affairs the Russian government hopes to put an end to by the annexation of eastern Galicia.

THE strategic plan on which General Brussiloff decided to accomplish these aims (the capture of Kovel and the seizure of Lemberg) was comparatively simple. As regards Kovel it involved a direct drive to the westward from that part of the Russian line centering at Olyka, which involved the capture of the fortress of Lutzk, lost to the Austrians last year. As regards Lemberg, it necessitated two simultaneous movements, the first from about the same center southwestward, taking Dubno town and fortress, also lost to the Austrians last year, and then proceeding along the railroad from Dubno to Radziwilow, with Brody, the first town in Galicia, for its immediate objective.

Brody once in Russian possession, Lemberg would have been menaced from the north. The second movement involved a general advance of the Russian army in position along the line running from Aleksiniec, in northeastern Galicia, already mentioned, to the Dniester River to the westward, which movement successfully executed, simultaneously with the first movement, would have

Filled With the Holy Ghost

A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

TEXT—Acts 2:4. "And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost."

WHAT was the spiritual condition of the disciples when the day of Pentecost dawned?

If I can only ascertain the attitude of their souls it may be that I, too, may assume a similar posture, and consequently share their hallowed experience.

Well, in the first place, they were engaged in prayer. Now, whatever else we may say about prayer, it is made clear by the teachings of Scripture that it opens a road between the suppliant and his God. A similar principle prevails in other relationships than that of the human and the divine. Aspiration always establishes communication between the aspirant and the end to which he aspires. It creates a kind of subtle telegraphy; it is a mode of conveyance or correspondence between the desiring subject and the coveted goal.

The principle is true in literature. The craving for intimacy with the masters and masterpieces of literature inevitably establishes a fellowship and communion. It is the same with music. It is the same in art. Desire cuts a highway to the desired end. The principle is also applicable in base relationships. A great craving for carnal delights opens a road on every side to the kingdom of mammon. Aspiration is the minister of correspondence, whether in things bad or good. Now these disciples were craving God, aspiring after the things of God, and therefore between them and their God there was "a highway and a way" for heavenly merchandise.

And then I am told they were engaged in united prayer. They were meeting "with one accord, in one place." Now, fellowship intensifies individual passion. Smouldering embers, when raked together, burst into flame. There is a subtle ministry of invigoration in the mass. The members of a regiment can accomplish deeds of which, in isolation, they would be incapable. An instrumentalist finds added inspiration when he is one of a band.

This is one of the secrets of the power of a revival service. There is an energy in numbers, and the emotional influence of a crowd deepens the emotion of all who compose it. And so it is with prayer. When two or three are met together, the individual craving is deepened and enriched, and the correspondence with the Eternal is consequently broadened and intensified. This, then, was the mood of the apostles. They were in the attitude of holy aspiration, an aspiration made all the more acute and fervent by the energy of united communion.

"AND they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." The Spirit of God came upon their spirits and possessed them in mighty and mysterious union. I do not think that the momentous occurrence is altogether remote from experiences which we can witness every day. The spirit of a mother comes upon her craving child, until between the two there is marvelous communion. The mother conveys herself to her child until the child is "the mother over again." This finds further illustration in the experience of the disciple drinking in the Master's spirit.

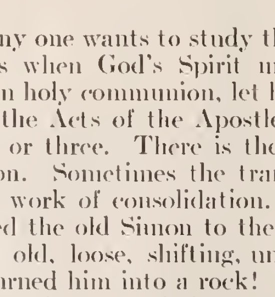
Take the followers of Newman in his great Oxford days. They paid him admiration, homage, and reverence, and between their souls and his the roads were clear and open; his spirit consequently came upon their spirits, and they became one with him in thought, in purpose, and even in manner and stride. I know that these illustrations are pathetically imperfect; they dimly suggest to me the mystic coming of the Spirit of God into the frail dwelling-house of man. God's spirit can communicate itself to the human spirit, it can "enter in at breast and brow," and in a most real yet mysterious way the divine and the human enter into communion and become one.

And this union of the Eternal Spirit with the human spirit is represented in this chapter under the symbolism of wind and flame. When God's spirit comes upon the human spirit it operates like the wind. It is surely not without suggestiveness that it would not be altogether illegitimate to offer the translation, "and the Holy Wind came upon them!" It was like the mixing of two airs, and the creation of another spiritual climate for the soul of man. It was like a fresh wind sweeping down the slopes of a hill into the stagnant vale, disturbing the sultriness, and filling the place with the power of a resurrection.

And who has not witnessed the miracle when the Wind of the Spirit has been blowing upon human life like a gale? Who has not noticed when a man's moral and spiritual climate has been entirely changed, and there has been quite another air about him? "So is everyone that is born of the Wind."

And the second symbol under which this union is represented is the symbol of fire. When God's Spirit comes upon the human spirit the ministry is one of holy flame. Moral passion is begotten, hallowed enthusiasm is kindled, there comes the mood and ardor of the Crusader. A man becomes "a burning and a shining light." The old chilling disposition has gone; the old lukewarmness in the presence of mighty issues is a thing of the past. The man becomes like Henry Martyn and "burns for God," because he is baptized "with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

NOW, if any one wants to study the resultant miracles when God's Spirit mingles with man's spirit in holy communion, let him seek his materials in the Acts of the Apostles. Let me mention two or three. There is the miracle of transformation. Sometimes the transformation appears as a work of consolidation. The Holy Spirit changed the old Simon to the new Peter. He took the old, loose, shifting, undependable Simon and turned him into a rock! He consolidated hearsays into convictions, and changed timidities and hesitancies into glorious heroisms. And such has been the multiplied experiences of the church; "Out of weakness they were made strong!" Granite powder has been consolidated into granite blocks.



And sometimes the transformation app rs as transfiguration. "And they saw his fac as it had been the face of an angel." That w a man in whom the Holy Spirit was dwelling, d he had become "light in the Lord." And hu n life always becomes gracious and graceful w n it becomes grace-filled; it puts on "the bea y of holiness."

Only a short time ago, I was in the Nort of England, and the proud minister introduced e to "one of our trophies," an old soldier wh in his latter days has received the Holy Gh t, and has thereby become the "child of lig ." Is there not, in this very town, one who use to spend the larger part of his time in jail, and w is "a partaker of the divine nature," and his ld vice-ravaged face is like a weather-beaten t illumined old church, or, better still, let me y he is like an old battered lamp, but with a e light shining within it! He is transfigured.

And sometimes the transformation app rs as revolution. When the Holy Spirit co es upon the human spirit, it acts like a my ic alchemy which makes lily-white lives from de d and sodden habits. Talk about the manufac re of gems! Turn to the Acts of the Apostles d see out of what strange material the Lord ma es his jewels! "Fornicators, idolators, adulte s, effeminate, thieves, covetous, drunkards, e-vilers, extortioners . . . and such were som f you; but ye are washed, ye are sanctifi ." This is the kind of revolution accomplished y the wonderful energies of the pentecostal sp t. "They shall be mine, saith the Lord, wh l make up my jewels."

ANOTHER resultant miracle, which hap s when God's Spirit mingles with m 's spirit, is the creation of a large and gracious m d of comprehension. Turn again to the Act of the Apostles and see what a widening d lengthening of the vision there is in referen o the hopes and possibilities of the Gentiles. e Holy Spirit always works in the directio of inclusiveness. Where there is intolerance d suspicion, there has been no blowing of e heavenly gale. There is no community in r land which has more evidently enjoyed e presence of the Holy Spirit than the Frie s. and there is no community which has n marked by a spirit of such rich and lib al comprehension. A stern isolation always den es spiritual impoverishment, as a generous c -prehension always indicates spiritual ful s. Individual pools along the beach obtrude t ir separation at low tide; when the tide is at e full they fill to overflowing, and become on

And lastly, when the Holy Spirit comes u n man's spirit there is a buoyant exultat n. There are some amazing combinations in e Acts of the Apostles which almost startle on in their apparent inconsequence. Put these o together: "And they raised persecution aga st Paul and Barnabas and expelled them ou of their coasts. . . . And the disciples were fi d with joy and the Holy Ghost!" That i a miracle which requires no labeling.

During the recent storm, which broke ou in the night, the birds of the woods began to s g! The lightning flash awoke their melody. is may have been from fear; but in the realm of e spirit it is the effect of holy confidence and tr st. "And at midnight Paul and Silas sang."

Watching Unto Prayer

SUNDAY, July 9. Eph. 6: 18. "Praying and watching thereunto!" This watchful suppliant is not, I think, just looking out for the answer to his prayers, although that is a very vital t of a suppliant's mission; but he is eagerly watch- i for people to be prayed for. He is on his watch- t er, vigilantly scouring the highways and byways f folks who specially need the strengthening ministry his intercession. John Smith of Harrow used to that he liked to walk down Fleet Street, where t people seemed so bent on business that they sely needed his prayers to help them. And so that secrated soul would go along the crowded thor- ghfare, looking into people s faces, and then lifting t ir souls on the wings of intercession. He was a gat watcher unto prayer.

And what a big and businesslike conception of yer this is! This man goes along the road, sees a t d, weary, war-beaten face, and immediately ngs into gracious exercise the beneficent ministry supplication. I wonder to how many aching hearts Jn Smith brought sweet inspiration and refresh- nt! And the souls never knew this passing minister evival! They told their friends that the cloud had ed, that they felt much brighter, but they never w the human source of the sunshine, nor from what rter the mystic wind had blown. One of God's tchers had seen them as he went by, and divine racles began to be wrought.

Vhat times we should have if this apostolic habit e ours! The ordinary road would become the hway of our God. The divine flower would possess t wayside bush. Lives which have been barricaded inst the Lord would open to receive him. And erywhere men and women would feel more rested, n in the midst of turbulent circumstances, as ugh to the power of walking there had been added t gift of wings.

And what about the watchers? What times they uld have! Because there is nothing which so re- fshes a soul as the bringing of refreshment to another. r Lord sat wearied at Jacob's well, but when he an to minister to a woman who was oppressed by aleeper weariness his own spirit was renewed: so ch so that when his disciples returned they asked h astonishment, "Hath any man brought him ght to eat?" In these realms the grace we bring to ers refreshes our own soul. There is no joy like joy we find in "the water of salvation," and ecially when we are handing the water to others. hen John Smith walked along Fleet Street, watching o prayer, it became to him as the street of another y, in which there is the tree of life. The Unwearying Shepherd

MONDAY, July 10. Micah 5: 1-8. "He shall stand and feed his flock in the strength of the Lord." e previous verses, quoted in Matt. 2: 6, clearly icate the application of these sublime words to our d. He came forth from Bethlehem Ephratah, his goings forth had been from eternity. He re the frail nature of an infant of days, but his is strength of Jehovah. We have here depicted his essant activity in behalf of his people. He is at s day standing and feeding them. They are scat- ed wide as the poles asunder; but our glorious pherd can see every sheep and lamb of his flock, l he gives them constant tendance. His eyes never mber, his heart never ceases to beat with love, and shoulders are constantly bearing back to the fold exhausted stragglers of his flock. The church may called to experience cloudy and dark days; but the od Shepherd will be with them in the valley of dow, and will deliver them from all places whither y have been scattered. He will himself feed his ep and cause them to lie down. Oh blessed careful- s and divine activity of our gracious King! Always tending against our enemies and shedding his cious influences on his friends. It is for this son that they abide, because he is great unto the ls of the earth.

But, combined with the gentleness of his Shepherd- ure, notice his majesty. Whatever he does is "in majesty of the Lord his God." Jesus is greatly to reverenced. The familiarity with which we ap- ach him must always be tempered with the deepest l most reverent adoration. He made himself of no utation, but at his name every knee shall bow of se in heaven and on earth. It is for this reason that he can be "our Peace," because in him the majesty of God and the weakness of man blend in perfect union. F. B. M.

The Psalmist's Belief in Immortality

TUESDAY, July 11. Ps. 73: 26. "God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever." The secret of the psalmist's faith in immortality seems to have been the clear consciousness of the presence of God in his own soul. None outdid him in picturing the weakness of the flesh. He impresses one as having looked into the deepest depths of sorrow and sighing and sin, but his songs always end on a rising note; his dilemma is a doorway through which he flies into God, his refuge, his fortress, his high tower, his rock in a weary land, his eternal hiding-place from the strife of tongues.

The Psalms are filled with contrasts—first the danger, the iniquity of the individual heart; then comes the sun-rising, the ever-present consciousness, "Thou art near, O God," that runs like a rich refrain through all these wonderful autobiographies.

Why do I believe in the immortality of the soul? Is it not, to speak simply, because I have had experiences that make me sure that God is in my soul, and therefore a part of me here? I see all other things change and pass away; even my own physical body is utterly changed; nature and earthly goods change and disappear before my very eyes. But the essence of my personality, my consciousness, abides from youth to old age, virtually unchanged. It is my hold upon God, of whom it is a part. The everlasting principle is the supernatural life of God in this life and in all life, and that eternal principle is the life of my own soul. C. S. C.

The World's Need of Christ

WEDNESDAY, July 12. Haggai 2: 1-9. "The Desire of all nations shall come." Many things are changing before our eyes, but there are others which abide, and these are the most important. The shakings do not affect them. God is the same. The soul of the race remains singularly unaltered, as is shown by the literature, monuments, and civilizations which are being disinterred from the past. And sin remains the same. Christ also remains. Society has not stood still during these nineteen centuries, but no advance has meant dropping him behind. Science has made vast progress, but though some of the old theories have given way, the fact of Christ has survived. We are in the throes of the greatest social upheaval that the world has ever seen, but above it all the Cross of Jesus rises in undimmed majesty and glory. And why? Why does Christ remain unshaken as a rock amid wild waves? The answer is unmistakable. He is the Desire of all nations. He meets needs in the human heart that are as deep and universal as humanity itself. From Galilee to New York, the souls of men have found in him peace amid storm, tranquillity amid alarm, rest amid disquiet, salvation from sin, redemption from evil. He has been the source of endless inspiration and devotion. He has made myriads of saints. He has inaugurated vast revolutions fraught with benediction. "Hark to the inner witness; Christ is here." Christ and his Gospel remain, and the hope, joy, and peace which are our eternal possession. See to it that your heart is clean and pure, with desires that reach upward, and you will find in Jesus perfect satisfaction and bliss, which in turn will prove his Gospel to be divine. F. B. M.

Conscience on the Heart

THURSDAY, July 13. Jer. 31:33. "I will put my laws on their heart." It is not the fact that the laws of God are written on our hearts which needs special emphasis, but rather the method by which these rules of conscience become workable in our lives. Conscience requires solitude and individual meditation as an atmosphere in which to speak to us. In the crowd, we do as others do, more or less thoughtlessly. "Every one else does it"—this phrase is the note that deadens conscience. George Matheson has said: "Love demands at least two; conscience is a voice to one." When in the solitary region of the soul we begin to measure ourselves against what we might become, when the great white life of the Christ rises before us, then God's writing on our hearts becomes luminous.

In Browning's "Easter Day," we find no vast assembly standing before the judgment throne, but one single human soul in solitude, as if to picture a crowd would spoil the judgment. Each heart must be opened and read alone. Cardinal Newman has the same thought, evidently, when in "The Dream of Gerontius" the man opens his eyes in heaven on Jesus alone. When the book of life is opened, each sees only the volume in his own hand, his own life.

One trouble with our conscience judgments is that they are so often in the crowds that are seemingly doing the same things. We thus easily excuse ourselves, and conscience becomes silent.

A young man said to me after a Bible conference: "I wish that my room-mate had been here tonight. He needs these things we have heard." So in a crowd we think of others, how it is "hitting" them; it is only when we have entered into the secret chamber and locked the door, that the laws of God written for us on our inmost heart become plain. C. S. C.

Times of Heart-Searching

FRIDAY, July 14. Zech. 3: 1-10. "The high priest standing before the angel of the Lord." Beneath those latter words we recognize the Angel-Jehovah, who appeared to Moses in Exodus 4. We are all called to be priests unto God, offering up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. But are there not times when we are clothed in filthy garments, no miter on the head, no insignia of our office on our person, whilst our disheveled robes tell the sad story of neglect? Are there not times when we feel unworthy and unfit to enter on our sacred duties? At the hour for household prayer, we are conscious of a soiled heart and a ruffled peace. As we ascend the pulpit, take our class, or mingle with our fellow workers, we recall bursts of irritability, proud and vainglorious thoughts, foolish words, deeds of shame; and we feel the incongruity of standing up as God's messengers between the living and the dead. At such times we resemble Joshua, with his filthy garments.

Our sense of shame is more acute as we stand before the Angel of the Lord. In the world's twilight much may pass muster which, in the light of our Master's sweet and holy presence, must be utterly condemned. Garments that serve well enough in dark, wintry days will not bear the searching scrutiny of the spring. And Satan reproaches us bitterly. But the Lord rebukes Satan. He has plucked us from the fire and will not fling us back into its consuming heart; but clothe us with fresh purity, and crown us with the miter of a renewed consecration. F. B. M.

The Death of the Righteous

SATURDAY, July 15. II Tim. 4: 7. "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." The hour is nearly come for Paul to put his head in the mouth of the lion, Nero; but it is better to be a martyr than an emperor, to wear a crown of righteousness than of golden, perishable glory. To the world, Paul's life seemed a failure; to saints and angels it is one of majesty and heroism, just about to be ushered into the presence of the multitude of the redeemed. With perfect love casting out the fear of death, Paul meets the monster with joy; even longs that mortality might be swallowed up of life, that he might depart and be with Christ, who hath abolished death and brought life to light.

To Paul, dying was but changing climates of the tempestuous and deadly for the healthful shores of the heavenly Paradise. Paul has fought the battle of life to a triumphant victory, won the race for the crown, and is now being covered with unfading laurels, as he is about to enter the celestial city. The evening time in his prison cell is bright with the brightness of the eternal morning. To him to live was Christ; to die was gain. Many a Christian soldier, when he comes to unloose his armor and look toward home, finishes his course amid songs of joy. John Wesley, when dying, kept repeating Watts' hymn, "I'll praise my Maker with my breath." At last, he could get no further than, "I'll praise, I'll praise." Lord Shaftesbury, when dying, said to his daughter, "Read to me the words beginning, 'The Lord is my Shepherd.'" When she reached the verse, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil," a gentle smile came over his face, for he felt the mighty comfort of the beautiful song as he passed through the gates of life. The Mexican Situation

ONCE again the country has been brought to the verge of war. We have reached the point where, from day to day, there has been the expectation of news that the break with Mexico had come at last, and that a conflict was inevitable. During these four years past, the patience of the American government and people has been sorely tried. So was the patience of Lincoln and McKinley tried while they were striving to avert war, only to be compelled to face it at the end. It may be our fortune to have a like experience. If so, let us face it bravely and unflinchingly, knowing that we have sought nothing but simple justice.

Our latest note to Mexico was practically an ultimatum. It brought the whole situation to a sudden focus, with the responsibility for the next move resting with Carranza and his advisers. We have already disclaimed any purpose of conquest, or even any desire for war. It was left for Mexico to decide whether it should recognize the justice of our demands and cooperate with us, or whether, by carrying out the threat of attacking our troops, both countries should be plunged into deadly strife.

The Mexican War seventy years ago had its actual beginning in an ambuscade and the capture of a small body of American troops. That historic incident has been significantly paralleled by the attack from ambush, by a Carranzista force at Carrizal, between June 18 and 21, on a body of American scouts, forty of whom were killed and a number captured. Whether this is the method adopted by the de facto government to force a break with the United States must soon become apparent. Of itself, the incident may not precipitate war. All the resources of peaceful diplomacy are not yet exhausted. There are elements in the Mexican situation that may yet combine to avert a serious rupture between the two republics.

The Christian Herald does not believe in war. It holds that no differences can arise between governments that are incapable of adjustment by peaceful measures, provided governments will yield to arbitration. Yet we must recognize the possibility of circumstances in which even the most peaceful and forbearing nation may be brought face to face with the evil of war by obstinacy of another nation. We have hoped that the Mexican problem might be solved satisfactorily to both governments, and good relations reestablished between them—such relations as exist between other Latin-American states and ourselves. But even if this sincere desire is now to be disappointed, we shall still have the consolation of knowing that our efforts at a friendly adjustment were based on a profound sense of justice and a generous desire for the highest interests of Mexico.

Whatever there may have been in our national policies toward Mexico in the past that is open to criticism, we cannot discuss these policies now. With the country on the verge of war, if not already actually involved in it, all other considerations must give way to the loyal desire that our government's attitude may be vindicated, and that a higher power may direct events for ultimate good. Yet even at this late hour we would still cling to the hope that a way may open to avert war, which can mean nothing but sacrifice and sorrow and suffering, in which there would be more loss than glory, and which neither nation really desires at heart. Nor should we forget that the road that leads to war is more easily entered than abandoned. It may prove a much harder task to get out of Mexico than it was to get in.

The Everlasting Arms

EVERLASTING is a long word. Everlasting is a long time. Everlasting Arms means arms that shall never grow weary nor weak. It is such arms as these that are under our souls.

Moses and Isaiah speak of an everlasting covenant. The other prophets also tell of that covenant. Isaiah speaks of an everlasting light; Daniel of everlasting righteousness; Jeremiah of an everlasting love; Isaiah again of an everlasting kindness; Matthew, Luke and John of everlasting life. All these everlasting things are summed up in the comforting words—the Everlasting Arms.

In our thinking and our emotion we have often the consciousness or the fear that we have not reached the foundations. We are distrustful, uncertain, apprehensive. Then we find a trust profounder than any we had reached before, an experience deeper. Then a truth deeper still, and a deeper experience. But the fear may still persist that we are not yet upon eternal foundations.

Then comes a day or an hour when we feel that we have reached at last the Everlasting Arms. We understand then why we were restless and troubled in the other days. We are finishing where we should have begun. We are forgetting the first words of the Holy Book—"In the beginning—God!" We are forgetting the Messiah's quick answer to the quest for the first commandment: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." We see that we have been putting other things between our hearts and the heart of God, not necessarily wrong things, or wicked things, or worldly things, but even good things—things like the church or the creeds. These things were meant to lead us to God, but we have been tempted to fix our trust and our love upon them rather than upon him, so our hearts have not been steady.

"As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you, and ye shall be comforted." "Can a woman forget her child, that she should not have compassion on her son? Yes, they may forget—yet will I not forget thee." "For the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee." "I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine."

But there is not only comfort and assurance in the Everlasting Arms. The power of these Arms is not only for us to rest upon, but to work with. Our souls fixed firmly upon the Arms of God, we draw from them everlasting strength for our daily work. "We are workers together with God." "It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure." We work restfully, triumphantly, because we are taking God's strength for the day's task. "He that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works," working no longer with his own little, brief strength, but with God's everlasting Might.

Many centuries have passed since Moses spoke this word of promise to the people of Israel: "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the Everlasting Arms." Again and again the nation of Israel has slipped from that sure foundation. The church of Christ has been built upon it. This, too, has often slipped. Thousands of souls have found the comfort and power of those arms and then forsaken them. Our own souls have wrenched themselves away once and again from this sweet and strong protection. Just now the people of the world are in sorer travail than ever before because they have refused to remain in the will of God.

Shall we not come back to the arms of God? Shall we not beg others to join us in that happy place of rest and victory? Shall we not announce to the church and to the world that their only Hope is there?

War Against the Anti-Social Spirit

HERE is a real war going steadily on while matters with Mexico grow less tangled or more tangled, pointing now toward war and now in the other direction. From forty to sixty thousand cloak and suit makers in New York City were planning to celebrate on June 28 or 29 the eighth week of their strike against the Manufacturers' Association. Public sympathy in this case has been more than ordinarily with the strikers, because the trouble began with a lockout on the part of the manufacturers, thousands of workers being turned away and kept away from their machines, and because later the manufacturers refused an offer of Mayor Mitchel to arrange for arbitration with the strikers.

As in other wars, this war means death for some. The first fatalities were reported on Monday, June 19, when information was given out of the death of two infants, due to the poor health of their mothers on account of the privations necessitated by the continuance of the strike.

Also, as in other wars, the strike is developing a solidarity between groups of similar interests, a solidarity that is expressing itself, not only in cooperation, but in sacrifice. At a mass meeting of the Cloth Cap and Hat Makers' Union, held on the same night that the death of the babies was reported, the members of this body voted to give three per cent. of their weekly wages to the cloak-makers as long as the strike lasts. This is only one of many cases in which the workers of other trades have made contributions. Even little girls, who have hard work to get through the long year on the small wages earned in their short season, are helping their fellow workers of the other trade. Workers of other cities have also contributed.

Rich, as well as poor, are helping the strikers. Money is being raised by the Women's City Club, and large sums of money have already been contributed. The Board of Directors of this exclusive organization declares: "The directors feel that the Manufacturers' Association, in refusing arbitration when offered by the chief executive of our city, and in their attempt to open their shops and ake individual bargains with their workers, have ken an anti-social position, not to be tolerated h the community."

Sympathizers' have given time and streng as well as money. Thousands of pickets on duty c ing the strike have been reinforced by sympathizers om all walks of life. Among the various places ut zed as rendezvous by the strikers is the Labor Te ple, a Presbyterian church at the corner of Second A nue and Fourteenth Street.

The City Club directors have epitomized th situation in their phrase: "An anti-social position t to be tolerated by the community." The acute uation at New York is simply one detail of a wides ead conflict. Religious people, as organizations ai individuals, must ally themselves squarely and enuously on the side of those who are clamori for social justice and against the program of thos who are following the anti-social spirit, which, being nti-social, is of necessity anti-Christian.

Religious Interviews

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSC IATION is developing a form of Christian ork which is worthy of attention, commenc ion and imitation. A booklet recently issued, en led "Religious Interviews," gives the outline o the method. The plan is to enlist the services of m ure Christian men and arrange for interviews be een these men and the younger men, either those ied with the Association or non-members. The p of the religious interview gives the young Christi , or the young person who has not yet decided to b ome a Christian, an opportunity to unburden his art, confess his struggles and failures, and get suc elp as can come only by a face-to-face, heart-to art talk with one who is walking with God.

Some time ago Dr. Robert F. Y. Pierce, who s of recent years been addressing the men and b of Wall Street in open-air meetings, opened an of e in one of the large office buildings of the street f the purpose of carrying on this same method of p ate interviews on religion. After addressing his lis ers on the street, Dr. Pierce announces that he h an office in an adjoining building and invites an who are interested to meet him there to continue th discussion of things spiritual and eternal.

Dr. Harry Marsh Warren has also been sple dly successful in a unique field. He is the Hotel Ch lain of New York, and has had a remarkable expe nce in saving from suicide many weary and discou ged men and women. The loneliness of stranger n a great city is overwhelming, and many a st of despair has been poured into the sympathetic e s of this man of God.

There ought to be in every city places widely k own and well advertised to which individuals wh are burdened with sin and sorrow may go for conso ion and guidance. Jesus spoke often to the multi des, but he spoke often, heart to heart, alone, wit one seeking soul. It is a kind of work Christians ou t to learn to do again.

Restaurant Reform

WHAT may result in a widespread cam ign, as far at least as our big cities are conc ed, is now under way in New York. R ent advances in the cost of almost all the necessa s of life have directed official attention to the qual of food now being supplied to patrons in the resta nts of the metropolis, and a general inspection b the Board of Health has produced some surprising r ults. Of 265 restaurants inspected in the course of a ek, only seven were rated as "good," being places in hich the food served and the kitchen hygiene were oth unexceptionable. Twelve others were rated " ir," while 246 were placed in the "bad" class. As ere are over 5,000 public eating-places in the city, the proportions indicated in the early stages o the investigation are maintained, the Health Boar will find itself confronted by a huge problem. list of conditions or rules is issued by the Health ard, calling for absolute cleanliness, good lighting and ventilation in the kitchen, medically certifie employees in clean, washable clothing, hygienic re gerators, screened doors and windows to shut out ies, all apparatus and cooking utensils to be of irrep chable cleanliness and the general conveniences to the health standard. Briefly, the rules are such , if followed, would result in good, wholesome od, properly prepared amid sanitary surroundings and handled and served by clean employees. At p ent there are only three states—Tennessee, Indiana and North Carolina—that enforce restaurant regula ns.

Died from Joy

MANY have died from grief, now and then one dies from joy. Patrick J. Sullivan of the New York City fire partment, who three months ago heir to $55,000 and instead of igning his strenuous job went back his blue uniform and duty out of love for them, died suddenly the er day. He was a lieutenant in e department, and had undergone amination for the position of otain, and had just been notified at he stood fourth in a long list candidates. He was overjoyed at e news and started home to tell wife about it, when he halted at e door of the headquarters, put his nd on his forehead, muttered nething, and fell. When his comdes lifted him they found that he s dead. He had stood the strain many hard fights through hot ys and frozen nights, and it is ely that his heart was weakened the strenuous labors of his calling. w many of these brave firemen ash their lives out to save the es and property of others! This o studied hard, improved his nd, was justly ambitious, and had ned his promotion. He did not e to work at all, but loved his ling. How natural for him to nt to drop everything and tell his e of the good news! It was the erflow of joy that came to him at stopped his heart so suddenly. rist's promise thus included supme joy for the human heart: "hese things have I spoken unto you, t my joy might remain in you, and t your joy might be full." (John : 11.)

Poisoned-Pen Writer

HE editor of a college magazine in a Western university was too e with his pen. The name of the per was the Research, but with him was the "Sword" with which he t right and left, wounding those o disagreed with him and espelly those against whom he had a sonal grievance. Four of the men had slandered caught him, carried n out into the country, cut his ir in jagged rows, painted his face th iodine, and then let the "yelv" victim go. Added to this grace was expulsion from the iversity on the charge of making eckless and inexcusable publican of defamatory charges against low students." The disgrace was e keener because the editor was a ior, a brilliant man, a Phi Beta ppa, an orator, and the winner of oveted poetry prize. A free press important, is necessary in a mocracy. But the law does not ow the defamation of the character the innocent, and makes it a crime th a heavy penalty when it is done. me papers and editors are scandalngers and should be treated with ntempt by all decent people. They the hissing rattlesnakes of society, king their fangs into the veins of se around them. The poison pen e the poison tongue, "setteth on fire course of nature; and it is set on fire hell." (James 3 : 6.)

nimals and Birds Imported

HE Atlantic Transport liner Minnehaha arrived in New York the her day from London with a collection animals and birds on her "tween cks" that included Russian bears, ringboks, antelopes, gazelles, antters, blue-faced chimpanzees, orangoutangs, Madagascar drumdrums, which eat while they sleep, according to Chowder Lall, the attendant; gnus and other horned wild animals from South Africa. There were thousands of canaries, parrots, macaws, cockatoos, piping bullfinches, lovebirds and flamingoes in big crates ready for shipment to various parts of the United States. The homeliest specimens on board were four Mariboo storks, which are four feet tall and have bills nearly half their size. The head and neck is bare of feathers down to the breast, and the wings are covered with a kind of rough wiry brown fluff, which gives the birds a moth-eaten appearance. Many of the animals with soft skin and fur and birds of gorgeous plumage with lovely dispositions were beautiful to behold. This ship, with its cargo of animals, reptiles and birds for the various parks, menageries and exhibitions of the country, suggests a floating zoological collection very early in the history of the race, which included "every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort." (Gen. 7 : 14.)

Destruction of Exposition Buildings

THE buildings of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, which excited so much comment and admiration, and for so many months housed such valuable collections of exhibits, are now being destroyed, and what seemed at the time to be the most substantial of structures become in a few hours a dusty pile of rubbish. Some of the statuary and decorations are sold to junk dealers, and to smaller exhibition resorts, and some of the building material is kept in stock for future sale by the wreckers. Most of the buildings are blasted down, and the material carted away for use in other structures, or to be consumed by fire. It seems like a waste of money to invest such large sums on temporary buildings, but it is not. All such things are educational. They represent thought, sentiment, enterprise, duty. The tearing down of material structures which have served their purpose seems a part of our earthly history. Houses blow down, burn up, or crumble in decay, but the thoughts they embodied, the purposes they served, endure. There are things about the gigantic mastery over nature at Panama and in the memory of it which can never be destroyed. In this transitory world the frail and perishable bodies contain the spiritual essence which is to endure forever. The tearing down of the perishable buildings of the exposition, and the death of the body, the residence of the immortal soul, illustrate the truth that "The things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." (II Cor. 4 : 18.)

Child's Presence of Mind

A FIVE-YEAR-OLD child of Lead, S. D., saved both himself and the family home from destruction by fire recently, although he was almost suffocated when the fireman rescued him. When the fire started he tried his best with a little pail to put it out. Failing in this he climbed up on a chair to the telephone, took the receiver off and coolly asked "Central" to give him the Fire Department, and notified them that the house was on fire, which brought an immediate response. The boy, however, was the cause of the trouble. He set the house on fire himself; not on purpose, but by carelessness. He and a playmate were alone in the house, and they got to playing with matches and set the bed afire. The companion made a bee line for home with fright; the little hero stayed and saved the premises. Children never should be allowed to play with matches under any circumstances. Much property and many precious lives have been sacrificed by such dangerous folly. In the moral and spiritual realm grown people as well as children are playing with matches, setting fires and causing damage not intended, realizing too late "how great a matter a little fire kindleth." (James 3 : 5.)

Plant Like a Chameleon

A FLOWERING plant is in most regards very unlike a chameleon. And yet one plant which made its usual appearance this season is like the lizard that changes its color. The chameleon, armed with a double skin layer, by nerve excitement changes from a rich yellow to brown and black, and from black back to yellow again. The dwarf-everlasting, the chameleon-like plant, changes the color of its flowers from white to brown and then back to white again. Early in the season the open woods and pasture fields put forth little tufts of woolly leaves, carpeting the earth with patches of white. A little later the leaves turned to green and silver, then little knobs of white flowers appeared. Half of them later turned to brown, and now the brown has made way for more white flowers. The disposition of the dwarf-everlasting to change its color is partly due to the fact that it bears two kinds of flowers: one kind, with large flat heads of creamy white florets, contains stamens only. These are the ones that turn to brown when their pollen has been distributed and their work done. The other flower heads are small and pointed and contain silvery white pistils, which receive the pollen. They remain after the others have turned brown and disappear. Their task is to keep alive until their seeds are formed for reproduction. What entertainment and mental benefit we gain by studying the divine thought in the mystery and witchery of the floral realm! We have this record of Christ's appreciation of flowers as the expression of his Father's handiwork and care: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." (Matt. 6 : 28, 29.)

Farmers' Debt to Aborigines

IN looking over the growing crops of the land few realize the debt the farmer of today owes to the aborigines. The potato, tobacco, and corn of the fields had their origin in America, and their first cultivation at the hands of the Indians. The tobacco, which has gone to every corner of the earth, while a source of incalculable money value, is in reality a liability instead of an asset from the natives, and the draught on the richest soil and richer brain and nerve tissue could be wisely substituted by a healthy plant, a food instead of a narcotic. The potato has been taken from the Indians to be grown in Europe and in the Orient, and has become an important article of food and wealth. But by far the most important gift of the aborigines to our country and the wide world is the Indian corn. The annual product of this cereal is from two to three billion bushels, worth around a billion and a half dollars. Our corn was unknown in Bible times; the cereal called corn in the Bible is our wheat. "All countries came to Joseph to buy corn." (Gen. 41 : 57.)

Where Men Worship Men

By
F. G. HITCH, Missionary

NEARLY thirty miles from Payenjung, Kansu, China, near the border of Tibet, stands the home of Ku Rong Fuyeh.

Ku Rong Fuyeh is one of the few Tibetan dignitaries who have a liking for foreigners. Most of them are suspicious and distrustful. Ku Rong Fuyeh has learned a good deal of Christianity, though he has not, so far, accepted it.

One fine day in May my companion and I started for his home. Our journey sometimes led us along narrow paths at the verge of precipices and deep ravines. At one place, had the mule I rode slipped or stumbled, these lines would never have been written.

Bound on the selfsame journey was an old man riding a donkey. He was ailing, so was going to this Buddha in order to benefit by his prayers. The Buddhas, still considered to be very holy men who have lived in the world before, and may again, are greatly respected by the Tibetans, who worship them as gods. Ku Rong Fuyeh is a superior Buddha. They say he will no more come back to this world. He rules over about six thousand lamas in twenty odd lamaseries south of the Yellow River. The southwestern portion of Kansu is almost exclusively inhabited by Tibetans. Once it was a part of Tibet, but the Chinese took possession of it.

Reaching the Buddha's residence, which we recognized from a distance by the whitewash on the upper portions of its surrounding walls, we were ushered into a nice guest-room by attendant lamas. Part of the woodwork of the room is of carved fresco work. Pretty foreign wall paper covers the ceiling. Good Chinese pictures are on the wall. The wood floors are nice and clean. The windows are of paper and glass. On a raised platform at one end of the room were some fine rugs for guests to sit on. There were also some good Chinese chairs.

We each, according to Tibetan custom, gave a scarf called a "kha-ta" to a lama to take to the Buddha as a present of peace. Soon he sent us a nice tray of food, and shortly after he himself came, bringing us two better scarfs than those we sent to him.

HE is a fine, big man, thirty-nine years of age, with a large head, massive face, a short, thick neck, and hair closely cropped. He was dressed in a robe of crimson silk, with a string of prayer-beads around his neck. He is a pleasant, agreeable and clever man. We talked with him in Chinese. While thus engaged men came in and bowed down to him on their hands and knees; most of them bowed three times. Then he touched their heads with his hand, blessing them. When he did this I saw a look of pleasure come into the faces of some of them, disclosing their deep reverence for him as a god.

A few years ago, not very far away, a missionary and his wife had to flee for their lives from infuriated Tibetans, one reason for their fury being that the missionaries had tried to stop such worship.

The Buddha showed us over almost the entire palace. He has many foreign things: among them are foreign stoves, a sewing machine, a musical box, an electric battery, a telescope, a camera and a bicycle. No one could ride the bicycle, so he insisted on my riding it. That the pneumatic tires were too old to contain air made no difference to him! Quite a crowd gathered, and next day some people came over three miles to see it. One of his men, seeing it to be an apparently easy thing to do, essayed it, but he only succeeded in evoking continual roars of laughter from all present, the Buddha included.

There is a temple on the grounds, two stories high. In it, in a case with glass windows, are fourteen brass gods. The chief one is a woman god, named Derwa. We were told she existed long before Gautama. Next in importance is Gautama, known by the name of Shir Jar Fuyeh. These two idols are set with precious stones. In front of Derwa are three bottles of acid pyrogallic, shells and ornaments. In another case there are many brass gods. In front of the gods, low down, are one hundred and twenty brass basins and ten silver ones, all containing holy water. In yet another case is a red-colored god named Dam Chun. He has six arms and three eyes.

ON the afternoon of the third day of our visit we heard a great noise in the temple. Fifteen lamas had arrived in order to hold a week of prayer. And they had begun. They were seated, Buddha-fashion, on mats, in two rows. Before them were low tables. They had bells, small drums, one larger drum, two horns, and a pair of cymbals to assist them in their worship. Before them they had some of the bundles of prayers we had seen. At the far end of the temple was an altar on which were scores of gods, many very small, made of barley flour, with butter for eyes, ears, nose and mouth. More were being made—molded by hand. Many small wax lamps were burning. The lamas were chanting in unison. One bell was ringing all the time. Occasionally all the lamas except one stopped chanting for a brief space, one chanting alone in a deep voice, then all joining in again. Occasionally all the bells were rung together. Sometimes the two horns were blown in addition, and less often the bells, drums, horns and cymbals all sounded out together, and, combined with the chanting, made a veritable din. There is nothing in it of a spiritual nature. Noting carefully some of the lamas' faces engaged in the week of prayer, I thought some of them might well pass for depraved characters, and such, no doubt, they are. Some days they prayed for about six hours, probably, to gods that cannot see, or hear, or speak.

THE snow fell fast and a bitter wind blew on a December morning when I started on horseback for the far-famed Kumbum lamasery. A large bag, with an opening in the center, held Gospels, tracts, and so forth, also bedding and necessaries for the journey. This was thrown over the saddle.

The road crossed frozen and partly frozen streams without bridges. I had not gone far before I fell in with a lama who also was going to Kumbum, he to trade. I was very glad of his company, for he knew the road and I did not. He also was glad of mine, as there was danger of robbers. Everywhere was a wild waste of snow-covered mountains. We crossed two big mountains that day. As the lama had been over it many times his guidance was unerring.

At one place, climbing a slippery bank, my horse slipped and fell. In struggling to regain his footing we both fell over the bank together. Fortunately it was only about three feet deep. The horse rolled over at the bottom. I think I turned a somersault in the air, but soon found myself on my back, on the snow, still clutching the reins, but unhurt. The saddle and luggage were on the horse's side instead of on his back when he got up. Five hundred cash fell out into the snow, and some Gospels. It was nice work collecting the scattered cash out of the snow! Soon we went gingerly on. Right glad was I to see the whitewashed walls of the lamas' houses, rising terrace upon terrace on the hillside of Kumbum, on the afternoon of the next day.

The lamasery at Kumbum is one of the greatest and most famous of all central Asia. But I think its best days are in the past. Now about two thousand six hundred lamas reside there, though about four thousand five hundred are enrolled. Grenard records that in 1894 three thousand five hundred lamas were domiciled there.

At the entrance of the lamaser are eight large monuments, which c ain the ashes of eight Buddhas. ong years ago, at the beginning of the ing dynasty, after hard fighting the Ti ans were driven back from Chinese rritory, which they had overrun for undreds of miles. When the vict ous Chinese general reached Kumbu he sent for these eight Buddhas and aid to them: "You can read the future can you tell me when you are going to ?" One of them, shrewd enough to u derstand the general's mind, said: To-morrow." "No," said the ge ral, "it will be today." And it was.

QUITE a number of temples and buildings make up the lam ry. The chief temple, which is dedi ted to Tsong Kaba, the great reform of Tibetan Buddhism, has a roof of variously conjectured as being fro on eighth of an inch to half an inch ck. Inside is a large image of Tsong ba, said by some to be of gold, but is probably overlaid with gold. The mple threshold is covered with p ks, and we saw many poor deluded ple prostrating themselves in worship ere. Around the main building are any large prayer wheels, which are kep vell on the turn by the devotees, to ain merit.

Everything is well organized. arious officials control the lamas. We saw many lama acolytes—young oys six or seven years of age. These oys are trained, and, after passing th igh three or four stages, are recogniz as lamas. "Lama" means "superio erson." A lama is called "aka," ich means "elder brother." When the lamas here are engaged in cha ing prayers they wear hats shaped ike Grecian helmets, and long red cloaks.

In February, 1912, their great p yer hall was destroyed by fire, and w it their sacred scriptures. But now hey have a fine new building, and the alai Lama sent them from Lhassa full set of scriptures: one hundred and ght volumes, wrapped in yellow clot on the backs of fifteen camels.

CHRISTIAN work for the Tib ans at such a place as Kumbum uld be exceedingly difficult. A treme ous organized force stands ready to o ose the missionary and to offset every ort he may make. We know that d's power is sufficient for this. Th is great need for prayer on the pa of God's children in the home-land for the very, very few workers wh are laboring for the Tibetans both o the Chinese and Indian borders of et.

A Campaign Within the Campaigns

FIRST place on the November ballot of California has been assigned to the total Prohibition measure providing for the discontinuance of the sale and manufacture of alcoholic liquors in 1920, and second place to the partial prohibition measure.

The Campaign Federation, the central organization under which all the rest are working, has live committees on education, publicity, woman's work, young campaigners, and so forth. The California state superintendent of education, Edward Hyatt, is publishing helpful bulletins for distribution to educators and parents. University men and students are lending their aid in making temperance sentiment.

In all parts of the state, grammar and high-school students have been sharpening their wits to earn the vacation money offered by the Campaign Federation and the State Women's Christian Temperance Union for the best street-car advertising card in favor of making California dry, such a card to be placed in every alternate car that goes on the streets of every city in California for three months before the election in November. The woman's vote is counted on as a great help in freeing the Pacific Slope of the drink evil.

Another of the five states engaged this year in a "dry" campaign is Michigan. Detroit, with a half million population and 1,377 saloons, is the only large city in Michigan, and the liquor interests there are said to be halting the construction of the tabernacle for the Billy Sunday meetings next September. Outside of Detroit, the temperance sentiment is very strong. Forty-five of the eighty-three counties now are dry under local option. Lansing, the state capital, became dry at the April, 1916, election. During the past eight years, 2,934 saloons have been forced out of business in Michigan, or 600 more than are at present in the entire state. "When and where has the saloon founded a school, a church, or any other institution for the uplift of humanity?" demands Governor Ferris.

More than half of Nebraska became dry at the April elections. That means a great deal; for Nebraska has over a million population, and a vote will be taken on state-wide prohibition in November. There are only a dozen incorporated places of over 5,000 in Nebraska, Omaha with its 100,000 people being the center of opposition to the dry movement. The liquor power has entrenched itself in the law-making body of the state, which now finds itself surrounded by prohibition states, the dumping-ground of the undesirable citizenship that follows in the wake of the legalized saloon. All the best influences have united to wipe out the traffic, and the prediction is cheerfully made that the state will give 20,000 majority for prohibition.

A fourth state in line for prohibition is South Dakota, where the April elections showed large gains. There are now 268 dry towns, and over one-half the state is dry area. Pierre, the state capital, and Hot Springs, the Black Hills resort, became dry. The Builders' and Boosters' Congress, representing the leading industries in the state, has endorsed the temperance move nt. The 1916 campaign is a double ne, covering both prohibition and vot for women.

In Montana dry campaigners ave the same advantage as those of alifornia—the ballot in the hand of women. The prohibition measure t is predicted, will be carried largely b the women of Montana, where 6,000 en are engaged in the traffic.

The total area to be brought der prohibition (if these five cam ign states are won for prohibition next all) is 518,409 square miles, and the tal population (census of 1910) 10,62 27. In addition, there is a vigorous and promising dry campaign in Alaska ith its 64,356 people and 590,884 s are miles of territory. If Alaska also s uld be won, the total prohibition ar of the United States would be incr sed by 1,109,293 square miles.

The area of the nineteen prohi ion states is 2,292,847 square miles and the population 27,344,013. In add on, local option has so swelled the pr ibition districts elsewhere that more an 60,000,000, or 65 per cent. of the po lation, and more than 80 per cent. the area are under prohibitory laws.

Sports in Alaska

By
FRANK G. CARPENTER

(Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

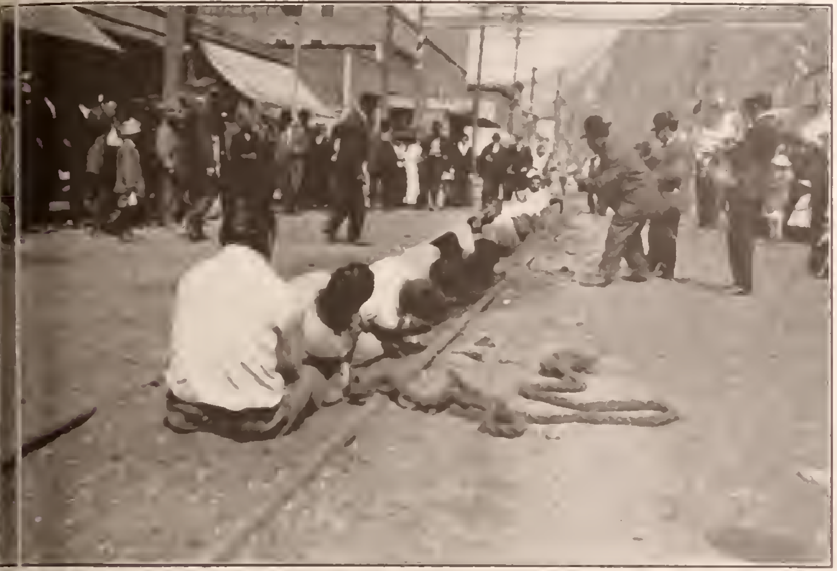
THE Fourth is celebrated in every town of Alaska. There is no doubt about the patriotism of this part of the world. I w more American flags on my trip fr Ketchikan to Anchorage than in th whole journey from Washington to Sa Francisco and northward to Seattle. E y town had American flags floatin from the houses, and a village of tw ty log cabins is sure to have two or ree flags flung out to the breeze. The people celebrate the Fourth and Ch tmas as the two great days of the yea Every town collects money for the Fo th by popular subscription, and the sp s often last for two or three days.

st year Fairbanks, in the very ea of the territory, had a two-day pr am. A copy of it lies before me. Th first day began with literary exercis including a speech and the reading of the Declaration of Independen This was followed by a baseball ga at Exposition Park. In the afternoon there were competitive sports, and ater in the day motor-boat races and swimming race. In the evening he was a dance, with music by the o band. On the second day there wa another baseball game, and sports ft oon and evening. Among the ea res of the latter was a chariot ac in which the best teams of the t ook part. Each chariot consisted f e front wheels of a wagon on wh a platform had been laid. The io s went on the gallop.

ong the evening events—it is as igl as day up to midnight the Fourth f ily everywhere in Alaska—there ve ladies' races, a ladies' nail-driving ontest and a tug-of-war. The m nt of prizes given was more than on housand dollars, and it was conri ed by the citizens, all of whom ve out in force to the sports.

e town of Anchorage was born onl last summer with the coming of he ilroad, and the baby municipality va ardly a month old before it celebra d its first Fourth of July. A place va leared of stumps in the center of he ty of tents for a baseball ground, an his served as the scene of the other po of the occasion. There were al eams of men and ball teams of vo n; and races of every description.

e Fourth of July came six days ef the first government sale of lots. o e then had a fixed habitation or a or. The most of the people lived n e flats in tents, waiting for the ov nment to lay out the town. There er perhaps a thousand tents, and hr or four times that many inhabi an All were expecting to make he fortunes in selecting good lots nd rowing up with the town. When he ction occurred the first lot brought $825 and the total sales of that day ran up to more than $100,000. Since then the people have shown much public spirit and patriotism. The town was laid out with large public parks, and there are to be tennis courts and amusement grounds.



A tug-of-war between rival Indian tribes

SO far I have to visit any town of size in Alaska that has not its baseball field. Owing to the topography of the town, which is built upon hills, rising almost straight up from the water, the diamond at Ketchikan is necessarily confined to the beach. It is situated in a cove or bay which is flooded when the tide comes in and it is possible to play ball only between tides. The wharves on great piles come close to the ball ground, and the people sit there with their feet hanging and watch the game going on below.

The baseball ground at Prince Rupert, over the way, could not be laid out on the beach. The water there is deep and there is no space clear at low tide. Nevertheless the town has its diamond. It is on the top of a cone-like hill, which was sliced off for the purpose. It cost twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars to blast the rock and level the ground. The field is now smooth and has an amphitheater of hills as its grandstand. Prince Rupert has a tennis court floored with boards and its people are fond of sports of all kinds.

One of the Fourth of July events at Ketchikan consists of fishing matches in which the halibut fishermen contend as to who can cast his line the most quickly and draw it in again without tangling. The men are wonderfully expert. The lines are several miles in length and there are hundreds of hooks on one line. The lines must be dropped so that the hooks rest on the bed of the sea. Last Fourth of July the men caught five dollars' worth of halibut while throwing their lines, and that notwithstanding the contest was not to see who could catch fish, but who could cast the line quickest.

Many of the sports of Alaska are held in the evening. This is so in every part of the country, and especially in the interior. It is so also in the Klondike, where, the 21st of June, a baseball game is held at midnight to celebrate the time when Dawson has twenty-four hours of daylight. Photographs are taken by the light of the midnight sun, and the playing continues until the wee hours of the morning.

The Dawson baseball park was made at a cost of $12,000. It is the scene of many international contests. Teams go from Juneau and other parts of our territory to play the Canadians, and last year Dawson sent a team to Fairbanks, seven hundred miles away, to compete for the "international championship north of latitute 53." White Horse, Canada, belongs to a baseball league which also includes Skagway, Juneau and Douglas Island. This league imports players from Seattle, Vancouver and other coast towns, and it has its annual games for supremacy.

Among the most enthusiastic of the ball players are the Indians. Some of the tribes have their own nines, which come long distances to compete with the whites. Last July a ball team came from the Pelly River, several hundred miles away, to Dawson to play the team there. The Indians were copper-colored, long-haired, lusty braves, and they ran like deer, playing in moccasins.

THE Yukon territory has so many Americans that it commemorates the Fourth of July as well as the Canadian holidays. The people of the two countries are very friendly, and in business and play they go hand in hand.

In this connection, I am surprised at the ignorance which prevails throughout the United States as to this part of the world. Many of our people evidently think that the Klondike belongs to Alaska and that Dawson is one of its cities. This ignorance even extends to some of the government officials at Washington. Graham Muffins made with Crisco

How to Make a Wholesome and Tasty Muffin

Good for Breakfast, Luncheon or Tea

1 cupful Graham flour
1 cupful white flour
¼ cupful sugar
4 teaspoonfuls baking powder
1 teaspoonful salt
2 eggs
1 cupful milk
2 teaspoonfuls melted Crisco
(Use level measurements)

Mix and sift dry ingredients; add beaten eggs and milk gradually, then the melted Crisco. Beat thoroughly and fill well Criscoed pans two-thirds full. Bake in a hot oven twenty-five minutes.

CRISCO
For Frying - For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco is a shortening which can be combined successfully with flour of any kind. It works up into a light, uniform, smooth, evenly textured dough.

Crisco is wholly vegetable, the cream of rich oil, sweet and pure, without taste or odor. Whenever it is used, even in foods recognized as the good old standbys in cookery, unusual richness and tastiness are revealed.

"A Calendar of Dinners" is a handsome, cloth-bound, gold-stamped book of practical value to every housewife. It contains a dinner menu for each day in the year, 615 recipes carefully selected and tested by Marion Harris Neil, the well known cooking authority, and the illustrated, interesting Story of Crisco. It is worth a place in every housekeeper's library and is a great help in choosing suitable dishes for these summer days. Write for it. Five two-cent stamps will bring it to you. Address Dept. S-7, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. A paper-bound edition without the "Calendar of Dinners" but with 250 recipes is free.

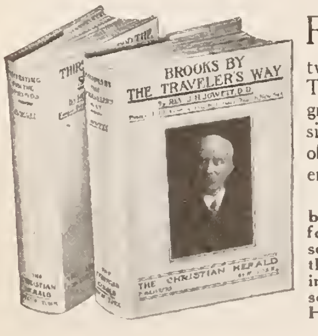
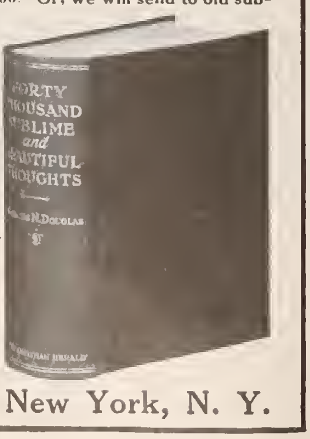
SELECTED BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous exp ession shines out on every page. Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition.

These two volumes aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.





Forty Thousand Beautiful Quotations

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. In the course of time the edition of this book was exhausted. We have had so many inquiries for it that we have decided to republish it this year thoroughly revised.

We will send this volume, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00. Or, we will send to present subscribers, as a reward, for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

ment sent a letter of censure to the postmaster at Dawson, because he had not been submitting his reports to the department at Washington. He told him that he must report regularly, and that if he did not receive a letter from him within a few days he would close up the office. The postmaster replied that Dawson was the capital and chief city of Yukon territory, and that its reports went only to the government at Ottawa. The incident occasioned great laughter in this part of the world, and the Dawson agent thought so much of it that he had the letter framed and hung up in the post office.

Similar ignorance prevails as to Alaska. One of the clerks of our Treasury Department once wrote to an official at Sitka, when that town was the capital, that the Treasury had very few blanks of a certain kind that Sitka had asked for, but that the Alaska official might easily run across to Nome and get some, as Nome had a double supply. Now, Nome is as far from Sitka as New York is distant from Omaha. The only way there is by sea, and the voyage is as long as from New York to Liverpool, and the steamers go once a month.

Our people cannot appreciate the distances in Alaska. By the ordinary summer routes, it is from 1,800 to 2,000 miles from Juneau to Fairbanks. Nevertheless, a merchant of the latter town told me he had just received a letter from a Boston firm, saying that they had drawn upon him through a banking establishment at Juneau.

Another man in the party described the troubles he had had in the purchase of a well-known dictionary consisting of ten or eleven volumes. This dictionary has been extensively advertised in the magazines. The man sent the money and asked that the books be delivered at Fairbanks. It was a month or more before he received a reply, when a letter came saying that the books had been shipped him from their Canadian branch, the company evidently thinking that Fairbanks was in Canada. The result was that the books were held at the international boundary for duty, and they have not yet been delivered.

ANOTHER amusing story relates to the time of the boundary dispute between the United States and Canada. The subject came up in Congress one senator asked for more infor about the Lynn Canal. He war know "when it was dug and wl it." When it is remembered th Lynn Canal is one of the great of the North American continer that it was plowed out by nature prehistoric past, the fund of in tion of the questioner can be ciated.

Along the same line of ignoran a letter received at Juneau f Philadelphia merchant in respo an order for certain goods to C. O. D. The letter stated tl Philadelphia firm could not send C. O. D. to foreign countries.

Among other instances of this k those which relate to the clin Alaska, which is different in d sections of the country. One chief merchants of Cordova t how he once ordered some wooler from a Minnesota mill through a in Seattle. The goods shoul arrived within thirty days. their failure to come, the agent the Minnesota firm and receiv reply that the order had no filled, as navigation was already and there was no use in maki shipment to Alaska at that tim year. The truth is that Cor right on the Pacific Ocean, and tl call there every week the year r

Singing on the March

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"IT'S much easier to march," a soldier once told me, "when you're singing. A bit of music makes you forget that the road is dusty and the day is hot. A lively tune makes you forget, almost, that you are tired, makes you forget that war is—war. It's much easier to march when you are singing!"

IT'S easier to march when you're singing! That fact has been demonstrated by the armies of the world. It's easier to be brave when the trumpets are calling the advance, and the drums are keeping time to the hurry of your feet. The music that you sing doesn't have to be reverent music, or great music, or martial music, just as long as there is a certain swing to it. Every one knows how the freezing soldiers at Valley Forge sang "Yankee Doodle" despite chattering teeth. Some of you remember how the Civil War soldiers marched off in 1861 to the music of "The Girl I Left Behind Me" and "Dixie." The soldiers of the Spanish War sang a silly little ragtime tune called "There's a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," and now across the sea they are struggling on to the rhythm of "Tipperary." Some of the songs were not great songs, but they have put heart into weary, homesick boys, and they've eased the tired march and perhaps they have even made dying a little bit easier. And so they serve a great purpose; for anything that can ease the horror of war is surely worth while.

Marching down a straight road—not knowing what horrible form of death is waiting for you behind the horizon line—must be the most terrible thing in the world. Marching down a straig knowing that each step tal farther away, not only from h love and family, but from the and the ideals of home, mu ghastly feeling. And yet men, them hating war and the deeds toms of war, are able to sing march down the road. It may torted sort of bravery, but it's just the same!

I KNOW of a woman who ha thirty-five years of her life, misfortune on every side. Wido left penniless at the same tir small children to support, thrown out into the world wit ent, no experience, and no training. The struggle was a b ter struggle, but she was brav to hold up her head, and smile at len sky, and sing. So finally, ing years of poverty and dist won out. She now has a little of her own, a flourishing little that she has worked up, by her very little assistance from the t to-help world.

A story-writer was hunting rial one day and, during the h pened to meet the woman. A pily chosen words brought out of her bravery and clevernes story-writer was astonished pressed.

"Your life would make a no exclaimed, "a wonderful, thrilli I'd like to write it up some don't see how you had the h downright courage—to keep should have given up and taken he woman laughed—the joyful laugh of soul who knows the real meaning of th kfulness. "I think," she answered, " t I was able to keep my courage be use always, after the very first, I ke cheerful. It wasn't easy either.

One night we didn't have much to ea My little girl began to cry from hu ger, and I took her up in my arms. 'S g to me, mummy,' she cried, 'and m. be I'll forget that I haven't had any su er!'

sang to her and she went to sleep. Ar then I prayed. The next morning so money came; not much, but en gh to tide us over.

After that I kept right on singing an whistling and smiling and praying. Or God knows how I did it sometimes. W ived in a tiny room in a tenement. an I found out, years later, that the ot r people in the house called me 'T Singing Lady.' They heard me, for enement walls are thin.

tell you, singing helped me to win! I ven't any voice, but somehow the rh m seemed to get into my heart and ma it beat faster. Somehow the lilt of usic crept into my soul and cheered it . I forgot how hard the way was wh I had a song on my lips!"

is a brave story, and it would make a g at novel. It is a remarkable story, to but the remarkable part isn't the fac hat the woman won out in the end. Th remarkable thing is, that she was ab o sing. Folk who are brave enough to ng usually do win out.

ging on the march—that's what th woman did, even though she was wi wed and poor. Even though her chi ren were often hungry for bread. Sh ad reason to cry, reason to give up in espair, reason, as the story-writer sai to take poison. But she didn't! Sh ang and smiled and prayed.

S GING on the march. . . . Oh, f iends of mine, it isn't only soldier- ne that sing. The term applies to oth than the cruel business of war. It ap es to our working world, in office, an actory, and sweatshop. It applies o e writers, and poets, and artists; it ap es to teachers and pastors. It applie to the woman next door, and the ma who shares your office. It applies o u, and you, and you!

e is a road that we march over. To me of us it is a pleasant path with gre meadows stretching from each id f it and flowers bordering the way. t there are others who find the oa long and hard. The stones bruise he feet, and the dust flies up into their ye and blinds them. Dangerous wa ps stretch on each side of that road, an the marchers do not know what wa for them around the curve or beyo the horizon line.

brave enough to sing on the march. in any kind of a song—it doesn't mater hat—but sing! If the road is a le ant path, your singing will make it le anter, and if it is a rough journey o song will keep your feet moving n our heart light. "It's much easier o rch when you're singing."

TIMKEN-DETROIT

Axles Increase the Cost of the Car

SUPPOSE that any car-builder using Timken-Detroit Axles should say to you—"I can put a lower priced axle under this car, give part of the saving to you and put the rest in my pocket." Would you accept the offer?

Not much! You know that axle safety can't be measured in dollars and cents; and you would not be a party to such a doubtful bargain.

But, as a matter of fact, cars equipped with Timken-Detroit Axles do not cost the buyer more than they otherwise would—for if the car-builders could buy or build axles of equal merit for less cost they would certainly do so.

These car-builders know that their best assurance of giving their customers maximum axle safety and satisfaction at the lowest cost of production lies in the knowledge, experience, equipment and large output of The Timken-Detroit Axle Company.

The better the car the more dependable is its market and the car-builders who use Timken-Detroit Axles year after year, do so because they value public confidence in their product.

Look over the list of "The Companies Timken Keeps." These users of Timken-Detroit Axles are among the most prominent concerns in the industry. They build cars on this principle—"first make it right, then add a fair profit and establish the price."

And Timken-Detroit Axles are and always will be built on exactly the same principle.

Motor cars and motor-car axles built on that principle pay both maker and buyer. You profit because your car is safer, lasts longer, has a higher resale value and lower upkeep cost.

The car-builder profits by the popular approval that increases sales.

So he is glad to give you the extra value of a set of Timken-Detroit Axles. He knows the difference in value far exceeds any slight difference in price.

And don't forget to write for that book, "The Companies Timken Keeps," and look over the list of Timken-Detroit customers.

International Sunday School Lesson for July 16
Acts 17:16-34

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"In him we live, and move, and have our being." Acts 17:28.

It was said of Brother Lawrence, cook to a religious order, that his time of business did not greatly differ from the time of prayer: that amid the noise and clatter of the kitchen he possessed the sense of God's presence as much as when upon his knees before the sacrament. As he proceeded in his work of cooking, or preparing the food in the kitchen, he continued his familiar conversation with his Master, imploring his grace, and offering to him all his actions. He uses of himself these remarkable words: "I am come to a state wherein it would be as difficult for me not to think of God as it was at first to accustom myself to it." No wonder that he was kept in perfect peace, that he as never hasty, never loitering, but did h thing in its season with an even, uni r-rupted composure and tranquillit of spirit. Is not this what the apostle m nt when he uttered the words quoted al e and what David meant when he said at God besets us behind and before? Ve talk of bese ting sin, but let us be ry thankful that we have a besetting d. Once more to quote Brother Lawr e. On one occasion he said, "Those o have the gale of the Holy Spirit gc r-ward even in sleep." Whether we p or wake, we live together with Jesus. In him we live, and move, and have our b g.

Athene—a God Now Unknown

By Arthur H. Howland

SAILORS coming back to the shores of Greece used to watch for the first sight of the Acropolis and the great statue of Minerva upon its summit. The statue was seventy-five feet high. The face, the hands and the feet of the goddess were of ivory, with draperies of pure gold. It was the work of Phidias, the great sculptor, and represented the ruling goddess of this fair city, the heart of the world's learning and culture. Athens was named for Athene, the Greek name of Minerva. She, like Diana, was a virgin goddess, and was known to the Athenians as Athene Parthenos. The great temple, crowning the Acropolis, was called the Parthenon, or Temple of the Virgin. Its ruins may now be seen by travelers to Athens, only a few columns remaining of the once glorious sanctuary. Nothing remains of Phidias's famous statue, but what is supposed to be a copy of it now stands in the central museum at Athens.

Athene was not the only deity of the Athenians. The number of gods and goddesses was bewilderingly great. Statues of gods, goddesses, demigods and heroes were everywhere. Many of these were shrines for worship. And to the traveling preacher-scholar Paul, who was wandering alone about the streets of Athens the day on which our lesson story begins, all these beautiful and artistic symbols of devotion spelled one horrible word—idolatry.

He was waiting for Silas and Timothy, whom he had summoned to meet him there, and while he waited "his spirit was stirred in him as he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." He began his work of preaching by addressing first the Jews of the city. There were enough of them to have at least one synagogue at Athens, and here Paul delivered again his proofs that Jesus of Nazareth was the long-expected Messiah. He also talked in the market places, which was an easy and natural thing to do in Athens. "For all the Athenians," Luke declares, "and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing." Socrates, the wisest of Athens' wise men, had used this same method, drawing passers-by and idlers into conversation, revealing by his questions their ignorance or error and then stating his own opinions and discoveries.

THE representatives of the different groups of thinkers argued with Paul—the Epicureans, who believed in pleasure, and the Stoics, who believed in pain. There had been something noble about the first teachings of Epicurus, but his followers had become sensualists, believing the pleasure of the moment to be all that was worth seeking. Their watchword had become "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die." The Stoics believed that character was developed by self-denial, not self-denial for the sake of others, b self-denial for its own sake. Prof ional and amateur followers of all the vari-ous schools of thought wished hear the Jewish street preacher who emed to be "a setter forth of strange ods."

But Athens did not altogeth have free speech. The Athenians were jealous of their gods. The judg had put Socrates to death some years efore because they did not consid him orthodox. The court held that had denied the reality of the Athenia gods and advocated a false religion. A now the Areopagites had to pass up the teaching of Paul.

This Court of Areopagus wa com-posed of regular professors and l urers at the university. They put ange teachers to test to determin their fitness and orthodoxy.

Areopagus means Mars Hill, ut it has been discovered that the co t did not always meet on this hill. ses-sions had originally been held here but at the time of Paul's visit to thens it often met in the Stoa Basi , the name of a royal portico near the arket place. Beside the judges, the ublic itself was admitted to these h rings. So our friend Paul had precisely t kind of an audience he liked when he pped forth to give the Athenians his as o philosophy and religion.

IN the first place, he did not t them that they were "too superst ous," as the Authorized Version transl s hi opening words. Paul was too kilfi an orator to alienate his audie e lik that at the first breath. "I eei that ye are very religious," tol them. He complimented ther upo their faith in the unseen world a upo their deep instinct of worship. his the thing upon which the C istia teacher may build, to whatever d h brings his message. Man l th instinct of reverence, of worsl , th deep conviction of a higher p er t which he is under some sort of liga-tion.

Paul had beheld their "dev ons." He did not at first decry their id trie He had been horrified at them, ut h knew that to the Athenians these deities were real and holy, and h ound and praised the good in their in tion before rebuking them for their e rs.

It is needless to point out hov neces-sary it is to do this in trying hel people, how eager we should e discover the good in them and wor upon this instinct of goodness i ryin to lead them away from evil.

Then Paul told them about t alta he had found "to the Unknown God." "This is he of whom I come to te you," he cried. "You are already wo ipin him in your hearts. It is no n Go of whom I bring you a message, it th God whose presence you alrea fee and whom, unknowingly, y ar worshiping. Whom therefore ye nwit-tingly worship, him declare unt you."

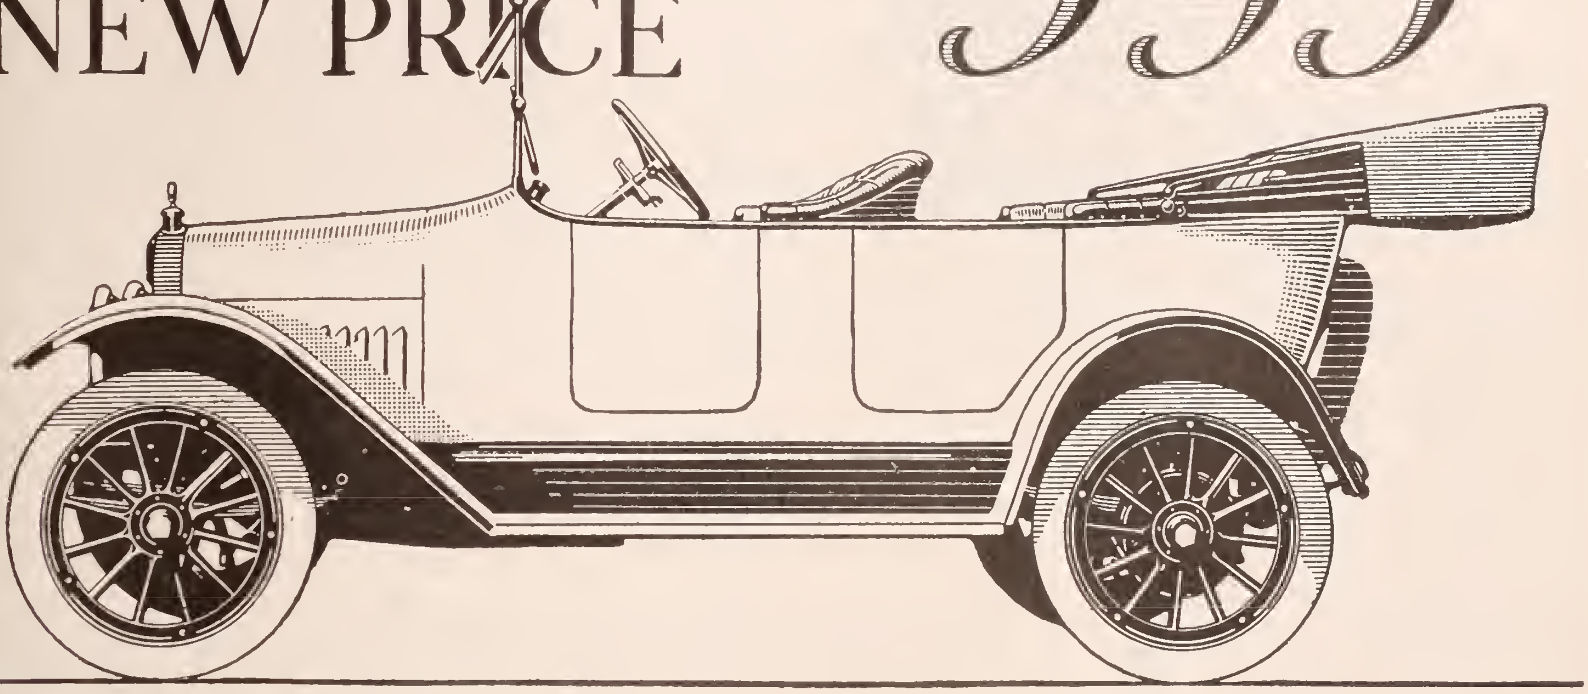
NEW PRICE



INCREASED PRODUCTION AND STANDARDIZED MANUFACTURING PERMIT REMARKABLY LOW PRICE

THE prices of Maxwell Cars are again reduced—$595 for the touring car and $580 for the oadster—effective July 1, 1916.

Only the price is changed — not the ar.

Greatly increased production educes our manufacturing cost er car.

Standardized manufacturing — nly one Maxwell chassis—makes ossible further production economy.

By reducing the price we also educe the selling expense.

Thus the Maxwell owner gets the nost actual intrinsic value for his xpenditure.

Bear in mind that the Maxwell s the World's Champion Endurance ar. Its genunine through-and-hrough merit has been established eyond question or doubt.

The Maxwell has lowered many records for gasoline and oil consumption. It is everywhere recognized as one of the most economical cars to maintain.

These facts, considered along with the remarkably low price now quoted, make the Maxwell the one big automobile value of all time.

This announcement will be read by hundreds of automobile dealers as well as prospective retail buyers. To those dealers who wish to know if there is any open territory, we will say that Maxwell sales contracts for 1916-17 are being signed now by our traveling salesmen. There will be some changes—particularly in the allotment of territory. Therefore, interested dealers, wherever located, should write us now.

WHAT THE MAXWELL PRICE INCLUDES

Long-stroke, high speed, four-cylinder motor; 20 to 25 miles to the gallon of gasoline (average).

Irreversible steering gear; automatic motor lubrication by splash and pump; 500 to 1,000 miles to gallon of oil.

Thermo-syphon cooling.

A running-in-oil clutch, so smooth as to make the driving of a novice as free from gear-clashing as that of a seasoned driver.

Tall, narrow, racing-type radiator, Maxwell-made.

Maxwell-made axles—I-beam front and semi-floating rear; heat-treated alloyed steel.

Gasoline tank in cowl; short, accessible gas line to carburetor.

Maxwell-made stream-line body, well finished in every detail. Deep, comfortable upholstery.

30 x 3½ tires all around, non-skid on rear; average life from 8,000 to 10,000 miles. Demountable rims.

Tire carrier at rear, with extra rim.

Substantial, Maxwell-made crowned fenders and linoleum-covered running boards.

Electric starter, electric lights, electric horn.

High-Tension Magneto, an independent source of ignition.

One-Man top with quick-adjustable, storm proof curtains.

Rain-vision, adjustable, ventilating windshield.

Paul at Athens

really worship, the ideals they cherish, the things they would like to believe, we should find there the picture of our Christ, who is the revelation of our God.

Paul declares the simple fundamental facts about this God, particularly saying that he needs no temples to dwell in and is not worshiped "with men's hands," that is, with sacrifices and forms.

THEN Paul makes his great international utterance, a verse that should be on every Christian tongue today: "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." The brotherhood of man and the unity of nations—this was the dream of Paul as it was the hope and the purpose of Christ.

God wants people to seek him. "He is not far from every one of us." The Greek conception of the gods was hazy. They thought they lived on Mount Olympus, and from that high place came down occasionally, sometimes visible, sometimes invisible, to mingle with men. Paul says that the true God is near every human being all the time. So near that the nearness cannot be described nor measured. "In him we live and move and have our being."

Along with that universal and true instinct of the existence of God and the need of worshiping him is the strange, mistaken idea that he is far away and that we must go somewhere to seek him. This idea is at the root of all pagan pilgrimages, some of them made at great cost and pain. Jesus said, and Paul repeated, that we need not go anywhere to find God. To the woman at Samaria's well the Saviour said: "The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth" (John 4 : 21-24).

SO not by going, not by sacrificing, not by suffering, not by toiling, do we find God; but just by trusting, just by believing that he is really with us, just by letting him touch and bless and heal and save us.

Then Paul was ready to talk about repentance. God does not scold and punish men for worshiping him wrongly before they know how to worship him rightly; but when the true light comes he wants them to turn from the darkness and open their souls to the coming of the Light.

Then he spoke of judgment and of the resurrection. The preaching of the resurrection broke up the hearing. Paul was trespassing here on dan rous ground. What he said might ups the faith of his hearers in what their ther teachers had told them, might a ken strange hopes and longings that heir other teachers could not meet; the court suddenly adjourned, judge and auditors differing and contending s to the things they had heard.

At least two converts were von: Dionysius, one of the council, d a woman named Damaris. Op ions differ as to the practical success of ul s work at Athens. Some scholars iink he did not found a church there, hers that he did, Dionysius and D aris being the first leading members Dr. C. F. Sitterly, in his fascinating book "From Jerusalem to Rome," ca our attention to the fact that "a the Parliament of Religions in Cl ago, in 1893, the Greek Bishop of ante presented an argument, based upon irrefutable historical data, tha the church of Dionysius and Dam s in Athens had continued an un ke course from its founding at the ands of Paul to the present day."

The people of Athens no longer lieve in the Athene they worshiped the day of Paul, nor in any of the oth gods and goddesses whose idols and rines grieved long ago his earnest soul. At astin name, they are all Christians now, cept the Jews that may remain there, ar upon all their altars is Jehovah's name.

J. B. N. Hewitt of the Smithsonian Institution. His ability in scientific research is recognized the world over.

This same reservation gave birth to the leading physician of Erie, Pa., Dr. Phillip Johnson. Having made his way through high school and business college, Dr. Johnson entered the Cleveland University of Medicine. He was graduated as president of his class. A post-graduate course at the Southern Homeopathic Hospital followed, during which time he also taught at Johns Hopkins. After spending some time abroad, Dr. Johnson returned and has established a practice second to none. Outside of his profession, the doctor's chief interest is in automobiles. He was one of the pioneer automobile owners of Erie, and has been prominent in the Erie Motor Club some years. Dr. Johnson's wife is a Canadian Mohawk, also college-trained. They have a daughter now studying in the University of Texas. Healing has ever been an honored calling with the Indian. The medicine men were always men of influence and power. And there are medicine women as well as medicine men. Several young Indian women have become capable nurses. Miss Minnie Williams, a graduate of St. Timothy's Hospital, has been superintendent of one of the Philadelphia hospitals.

Several excellent teachers among both whites and Indians have been bred on Iroquois reservations. One young woman, Nellie Patterson Gansworth, has distinguished herself along the lines of arts and crafts. She won a scholarship at Philadelphia Museum and Schools of Industrial Arts. A Mohawk girl, the granddaughter of Chief Running Deer, has achieved European fame in the art of dancing. Miss Deer has appeared for the royal families of Bavaria, Norway, Saxony, Denmark, Hungary and Russia, and has received several medals bearing royal arms. Another Mohawk, Oskenonton, has a fine baritone voice and is studying grand opera in New York.

There are a number of splendid bands among the Iroquois, and fine band masters. Probably the best-known organization was the American Indian Concert Band, conducted by David Russell Hill, an Onondaga. For two years this band toured the principal cities of Germany, Austria, and France, and also won several gold medals in tournaments held in this country.

The Indian possesses an innate love of music. From the time he hung on a tree in his little pappoose cradle, gently rocked by the summer winds, and sung to by the birds, his ear has been trained to catch nature melodies and rhythms. He still hears them and is able to interpret them.

There are several Iroquois employed in government schools, and in the Forest Commission Service. Many have distinguished themselves as athletes. Louis Bruce, a Mohawk, now one of the most aggressive and earnest ministers of Onondaga, was formerly a famous pitcher of the Toronto League.

LAST but not least in importance are the farmers. There are many Iroquois applying intelligent labor to the soil. A few are so successful at this vocation that they ride in automobiles and employ white men. Chief Grant Mount Pleasant of Tuscarora has a fine fruit farm of 250 acres. Chief William Johnson and Titus Patterson have large dairy and grain farms on the same reservation. The Cattaraugus and Tonawanda reservations have several thrifty farmers successfully tilling the land.

There are, however, many Iroquois attempting to cultivate the land at formidable disadvantage. With poor horses that they cannot properly care for, and almost no tools, it is impossible for them to compete with the well-equipped farmer. The greatest need of reservation life today is the encouragement of such farmers. The state should advance money for their proper equipment. Give an Indian who really desires to cultivate land a good team, necessary tools, and the seed, and he will make good. The soil is our greatest asset. Let the white man make it possible for the Indian to make it his asset. This is one way in which the present generation can in part retrieve the wrongs of the past.

A Missing Son

WE have been requested to print a notice in the Christian Herald of the disappearance in July, 1914, of the son of Mrs. Diantha Smith of Walden, N. Y., and to request information as to his whereabouts for her benefit. The young man's name is Nelson Talmadge Smith, and he is spoken of in high terms by those who formerly knew him. He drove off with a companion in July, 1914, and the two sold the horse and buggy in Newburgh, and since then nothing has been heard of young Smith, though the companion has been heard from, but tells c flicting stories. We have no picture d no description of this young ma bu hoping that some good may be complished by doing so, we gladly blish this notice at the request of a ci en of Walden.

nea d Lemberg not only directly from the as t also from the southeast, and the effect f th two movements executed as above de- crib would probably have been to force the ust ns out of Lemberg and compelled them o fa back to Przemysl, west of that town.

A ollateral objective, the occupation of uk ina by the Russians, involved a third ov ent, which was to be executed by a riv directly south by that portion of the uss army which was in position along the nie r River and the section between that er d the Pruth, and along the latter to the ord of Rumania. The end to be achieved y h occupation was not so much the ss on itself of Bukowina, as the effect hic such possession would have on the eig ring state of Rumania, whose policy la has not been satisfactory to the Allies ge al and to Russia in particular.

W will now review the achievements in h these movements, basing ourselves on e cial bulletins of the three countries vol d and the map only, and disregarding e sip and rumors of the various news en s and the non-official accounts of what igh ave been had it happened.

Ta g up first the offensive in Volhynia ain Kovel. This started by a strong ive the westward by the Russians on June an was in the beginning completely suc- ssf The Russians in superior numbers rle hemselves forward with an impetuosity hic roke the Austrian first and second lines, d t vigor of the rush carried the Russians t o up to but beyond Lutzk, and the fall th fortress soon followed, all its garrison ng ken prisoners.

Lu once fallen, the Russian advance ain ecame rapid, and to the west thereof e S River was reached and crossed. But en re the Russian advance did not stop t tinued to drive westwardly until the e he Stockod River, which runs practi- ll rth and south and crosses the line of e and west running railroad and high- d om Lutzk to Kovel, was reached, a nt out twenty miles to the east of Kovel. e ssian line extended a distance of about e es north of this railroad and perhaps t elve miles south.

As e Russians neared the Stochod River, ir ward progress had become slower and we wing to the stiffening of the Austrian st e, and when they reached the line of hod, where they met German troops ry forward to the aid of their allies, ssi westward progress stopped. The ole the past week (June 16-23) on this e h been taken up by desperate attempts th Russians to resume their progress, of ch up to the present time, none has been e l, they rather having lost than ne ground.

T ING now to the driv southwest on L berg. This started a few days later n drive on Kovel, on June 8, and for fl few miles proceeded rapidly and al- st hout opposition, and three days later ssians drove the Austrians out of dzilow and occupied the town. The str s retreated to Brody. Here, however, y re apparently reinforced, since when R sians started to advance from Radzi- ow o Brody, they found their progress te y the Austrians, who were advancing ar hem. Since then there has been hard iti between the two towns, neither side ng le to advance appreciably.

Th offensive along the Strypa River, in ter alicia, which was intended to advance tw l simultaneously with the offensive Ra iwilow and Brody, was a very great zl luring its early days. The Russian cia ulletins for several days in the first t e, in their account of the Russian ans, names of places which are to the t. t is, the rear, of the Russian battle l which had been in Russian hands m ths), as newly captured places. In y a very few towns were named in se lletins which are in front of the old ssi line. This mystery is not entirely re p, and all that can be said with any re accuracy as to affairs on the northern tio of the front, as far south as where the yp alls into the Dniester, is that the ssi have not been able to advance across St pa permanently at any point, so that ition of the Russian offensive has e o ground whatever.

ou of the Dniester, the Russians made gress, however. Horodenka and esz ki and Sniatyn were captured after ou ombats with their Austrian defenders, f back on Kolomea on the Pruth River, h uth of the two first-mentioned towns, t he west of the last mentioned. Kol- a since been attacked by the Russians eat y, but the Austrians have succeeded ar beating them off.

till arther south, the collateral Russian nsi has been the most definitely success- of the movements. The Russians forced as e of the Pruth River at Czernowitz r eral days hard fighting, and for the l e since the war began entered the ov ian capital as victors. Later, in the k, they pushed farther south and he capturing several towns, and ly the end of the week, not only reached e sed the Sereth River, driving the Austrians before them, and seriously threatening in the next few days to render themselves masters of the whole of Bukowina. Besides which the Russians have placed the Austrian army opposing them here in a position from which, owing to lack of means of transportation, it will perhaps be difficult for it to extricate itself without heavy losses.

In the entire offensive, the Russians claim to have taken about 175,000 prisoners, but this statement must be accepted with great caution. Of the offensive, as a whole, it can be said that while it has in some theaters of operation achieved considerable progress, except in Bukowina, this progress has not been sufficient to justify a forecast that it will ultimately achieve its strategic objectives; besides which, at present, in its farther progress, it is encountering much stronger resistance.

Some echoes of the naval battle of the Skagerrack reach us. The British Admiralty stated their amended loss in officers as 343 killed or missing, 51 wounded; the German at 172 killed or missing, 41 wounded. The British have published to date the names of 6,104 men killed or missing and 513 wounded. The German official statement of the loss of men is 2,414 dead or missing, 449 wounded. The Germans hold 177 British prisoners, while the British made no return of German prisoners.

There are no signs of that general offensive by the Allies on this front which was heralded from London as imminent last week. This is not, however, very surprising, as while there will probably be a general offensive by the Allies on the western and the Salonica front this year, it is far more probable to come after August 15 than before.

The situation on the Austro-Italian front has not materially changed, that sure index, the map, showing only trifling changes of position. The Italians, however, assert that no Austrian troops have been withdrawn from this front, and that the enemy is "stubbornly persisting in his original scheme." They also admit that they are now on the southern edge of the Asiago basin, though they assert that they have repulsed all the Austrian efforts to break through their lines, particularly between Monte Le Merle and Monte Magnaboschi, which mountains form part of the southern boundary of this basis.

The western front all the week has been the quietest it has been for months. Even around Verdun, as far as infantry actions go, there have been only very minor clashes, without result. The rival artilleries, however, have been occasionally quite active, though the bombardments have not been as sustained or as continuous as heretofore.

ON June 21 the Skouloudis Cabinet handed their resignation to the king of Greece and ex-Premier Zaimis was commissioned by the king to form a new cabinet. The change of cabinet was forced by the pressure of new demands of the Entente Allies, which were supported by a complete blockade of Grecian ports and a naval demonstration before the port of Athens. These demands were: 1st, real and complete demobilization of the Greek army. 2nd, the immediate replacing of the present Greek cabinet by a business cabinet having no political color and offering all necessary guarantees for benevolent neutrality toward the allied powers; 3rd, the immediate dissolution of the Chamber followed by new elections; 4th, replacement of certain police functionaries, who had been suppressing pro-Ally demonstration. Ex-Premier Skouloudis refused to receive the note. The new government accepted the demands in their entirety. The demands upon the Greek government were made by the representatives at Athens of Great Britain, France and Russia which, under the protocol of London assumed protection of the kingdom of Greece. It was declared that the "three guaranteeing powers do not require Greece to abandon her neutrality."

ON June 23 Congress passed a joint resolution authorizing the President to draft the National Guard into the military service of the United States. Orders were issued from Washington for the dispatch of National Guard units to the border as fast as they were made ready, companies, battalions, regiments or brigades to go forward without regard to the readiness of other units to which they were related. Eight survivors of the battle at Carrizal who have reached General Pershing's headquarters, confirmed the report that General Gomez had led the two troops C and K, of the 10th cavalry into the trap, the Mexicans deploying on both flanks of the Americans while Captains Boyd and Morey were arranging with General Gomez for passage through the town. When the Mexicans had reached their position, General Gomez withdrew and the Mexicans opened fire. The Americans dismounted and returned the fire. Captain Lewis S. Morey was probably killed and 59 men of the two troops were still unaccounted for on June 24. It is reported that a regiment of Porto Rican troops and 10,000 Philippine scouts and constabulary will be given active service in Mexico.

NEW PERFECTION

LOOK for the LONG BLUE CHIMNEY

OVER two million American women have learned to look for this long blue chimney as a means of identifying the oil cook stove that doesn't smoke, doesn't smell, doesn't get out of order—that roasts, toasts, bakes and broils better than a gas stove.

A few hundred or a few thousand users wouldn't prove much. But the New Perfection Oil Cook Stove has made its way into one out of every ten homes in the United States and Canada. That must mean that it has made an important contribution to the comfort of American housewives.

To do the cooking for a family of six, the New Perfection burns only an average of 6 cents' worth of oil a day. And the long blue chimney burner converts every drop of fuel into clear, intense heat.

Instantly lighted or extinguished; easy to clean and care for. A high flame or a low flame just as you want. The flame once "put" stays "put."

New Perfections, in many styles and sizes, are sold by most good dealers. Prices from $3.00 up.

NEW PERFECTION KEROSENE WATER HEATER

Has three long blue chimneys and provides an abundant circulating supply of hot water for laundry, kitchen or bathroom at low cost. Easily installed. Write for booklet.

Lord Chesterfield hired a man to help him Shave

ADOLPH TREIDLER

WHEN Lord Chesterfield's old valet died, his lordship was put to it to find a successor. None of them could shave him without chafing his skin. Finally he solved the problem by engaging a famous barber to teach him how to shave and how to care for his Razors.

Think how Chesterfield, that master of etiquette and accomplished man of the world, would have welcomed the Gillette Safety Razor.

One can imagine him describing it in his famous "Letters to His Son" as a valued accessory to the grace of living and a thing every gentleman should use.

"A gentleman's shave"—such a luxury in Chesterfield's time is now accessible every day to every man who owns a Gillette.

The Gillette shave is velvet-smooth, no matter how wiry the beard or tender the skin. A keen, fresh blade is always ready. Prices $5 to $50. Blades 50c. and $1 the packet. Dealers everywhere.

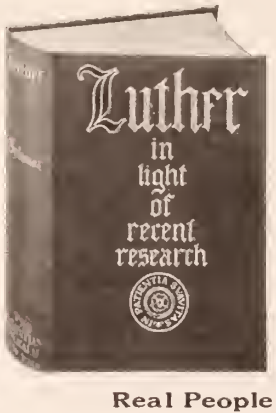
SELECTED BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING

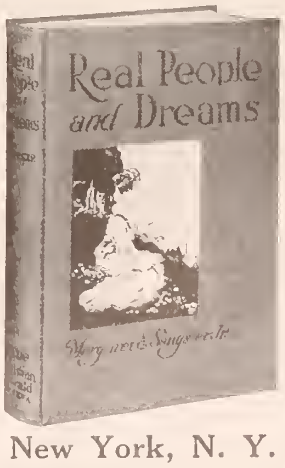
Luther in Light of Recent Research



WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago. The Foreword to Boehmer's work by Professor J. H. Robinson of Columbia University, pays a high tribute both to biographer and to the translator.

We will send the Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $2.25. We will send a copy to present subscribers, as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

Real People and Dreams



MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR., does not make up her stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind as winter sprites trace wonderful pictures on windowpanes, and then simply because she cannot help herself, she sets down a description of these pictures. There are, in "Real People and Dreams," about 80 poems and 32 short stories and sketches.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster, and illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to present subscribers, as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

"JUST DAVID"

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "POLLYANNA"

Just David
By Eleanor H.Porter
Author of Pollyanna - Miss Billy - The Story of Marco - The Turn of the Tide - Cross Currents

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. Everywhere one hears the same verdict: "I want to read it again"; "It kept me up half the night to finish"; "It's the most appealing story I ever read"; "It's made the world look rosy ever since." Its optimism is catching.

David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend.

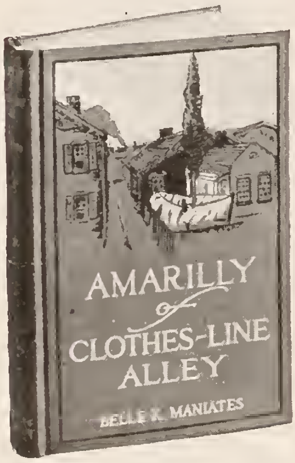
"Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

Special Offer We will send a copy of "Just David" as a reward, with our compliments, to a present subscriber for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by one dollar.

Or we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for another year and send a copy of "Just David" postpaid for $2.00.

"Amarilly"

IN BOOK FORM



We have had so many inquiries for "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley" in book form that it gives us much pleasure to announce the sale of a special edition of this splendid story. No one who had read the book can forget the charm of Amarilly. Amarilly was a child of the slums, the oldest of a family of eight, all wage-earners, except the baby. How prosperity in the end came to the Jenkins Family, how Amarilly got an education, how the Boarder married Lily Rose and built an annex and the adventures of the surplice are told in a wholesome story.

We will send "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," attractively bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $2.00.

Or, we will send "Amarilly" to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription to the Christian Herald with one dollar.

Questions and Answers

G C., Norwood, Pa. Was not the Day of Pentecost an indication pointing the way in which the church should attract and awaken the world rather than by newspaper advertising, street parades, etc.? If a church has the Pentecostal spirit and the Word is preached in "demonstration of the Spirit and of power," and the singing and praying of the members in the same spirit, would any other publicity be necessary?

You are undoubtedly right in insisting that the church needs the Pentecostal power for attracting people to it: but it does not seem to us that this makes all announcements of the church services unnecessary. After all, there is only one question to be considered: "Does advertising the church's activities induce people to come?" If it does, it is a good thing. Paul declared he was made "all things to all men, that he might by all means save some." Doubtless the chief reason the early Christian leaders did not advertise their meetings, where it was safe for them to assemble at all, was that there were no newspapers and no advertising columns and no available bill boards. A favorite Scripture word for the divinely sent messenger is "herald." In fact, "preacher" and "herald" are the same word. A herald is an announcer. The Christian messenger announces the news of God's grace, and he wants everybody to hear him. Anything within reason he can do to increase his audience he should by all means attempt. But first things must come first. The minister and his people need the Pentecostal blessing or they will not have anything much to tell the people when they come; it was the joy and blessing of Pentecost that produced such striking manifestations that the multitudes came running to find out the cause. See Isa. 55 : 5.

Seeker, Lowes, Ky. Religion in the heart quickens the whole man and gives zest and new meaning and a wider and grander scope to the life. If we are to regard the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit, it follows that our whole life and habits will be wisely regulated in accordance with God's laws, and that we will do all that in us lies to make the temple clean and fitting for the divine occupant. Cultivating the Christ spirit brings health and happiness; it inspires us with courage and endurance to face all trials and to surmount every difficulty; while the peace it brings makes worry and hatred and all bitterness powerless to annoy. And if we abound in loving service, sharing our blessings and confessing Christ before men, the heart sunshine will give grace to the lips and a spiritual value to every act.

J. F., Kellogg, Idaho. Commentators advance the opinion that the divine being who wrestled with Jacob at Penuel ("The face of God") was the angel of the covenant. Although the narrative makes no express mention of sleep, when one remembers the exhaustion and anxiety of Jacob and his supplications for aid, it is not unreasonable to conclude, as some writers have done, that it was a vision granted to give him strength and courage, and to increase his faith in God, so also in the case of Moses in Ex. 33 : 18–23, which describes one of the most mysterious scenes in the Bible. He received, as one commentator writes, "for his comfort and encouragement, a display of the divine majesty, not in its unveiled effulgence, but as far as the weakness of humanity would admit." The face, hands and back are to be understood figuratively.

Mrs. W. V. A., New York City. There are five Marys spoken of in the Bible, viz., Mary the mother of Jesus, Mary Magdalen, Mary the sister of Lazarus, Mary the wife of Cleopas, and Mary the mother of John. The other question is a mere matter of conjecture.

F. S. B., Greeley, Colo., writes: "I abhor war or quarreling of any sort. I am for peace all the time. There is no need for anything else if people would only obey Jesus' teachings. Oh, what a beautiful world this would be to live in if everybody would do as well as they might! I despise grafting and dishonesty of any kind. I do not care for past history; it is enough for me to know the present and what of the future it is possible for me to know. If you will tell me how I can get that kind of knowledge, I shall feel very grateful." F. S. B. is like millions of his fellow countrymen in his desire for peace and good will among men. It is the ideal taught by the Master, and it is a sad disappointment to peace-lovers and peacemakers to find an element among us that seems bent on war, or the preparation for war. Let us hope that the great body of Americans who take the peace view may prevail, and that our government in Washington may be brought to realize that the cultivation of the war spirit is un-Christian and is sure to bring war if persisted in. Our Book Department is sending you a list of books from which you can make a selection. Any reader will be sent a list on application by postal.

P. T. W., Motley, Minn. One who meets death bravely, that another may live, should certainly not be classed with the foolhardy or the suicide. Charles Frohman and Alfred C. Vanderbilt might have saved their own lives, it is true; but they chose the nobler way—to save others. The man who took off his own life-preserver and placed it upon a child did not think for an instant whether his act would invalidate an insurance policy or not. To stand between another and danger or death is just as surely a heaven-born impulse, if the object of solicitude is a little stranger child as though it were done for the nearest and dearest of one's kin. Said the Master, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." And he, who was to die for the whole world, knew best of all.

Citizen, Bowers Mill, Mo. Your article on "Degrading Sports" of April 12 encouraged me to ask for one on "Pie Suppers." Many day schools raise money for libraries, and Sabbath schools raise money for church buildings, literature, etc., and young men and boys (who can least afford it), pay ten times the worth of a pie at these suppers. Men who give little themselves will auction off the pies and encourage boys to bid.

Such ways of raising money for religious, or even for secular objects, are vulgar and should be discouraged. Yet we find the same plan followed in "oyster suppers," etc., the principle being, of course, to get as much as possible for the least outlay. People in certain localities get accustomed to these things, we suppose. They should be consigned to oblivion, with fairs, and raffles. A first-class illustrated lecture, a really good concert, or even an old-fashioned sociable is to be preferred.

Mrs. J. B. Beall, Mayesville. Write to Rev. Parley E. Zartmann, Winona Lake, Indiana, secretary of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists. This work of "personal helper" in evangelistic campaigns is a splendid field for consecrated women. You are doubtless also familiar with the deaconess work, and the office of "pastor's assistant," or "minister's social helper." All these fields offer great opportunities for Spirit-filled, intelligent women.

C. W. C., Findlay, O. The oldest Bible manuscripts now in existence date from about 300 to 450 A.D., and show us the Bible as it existed soon after apostolic days. All the earlier manuscripts were either lost or destroyed in the terrible persecutions, which were directed not only against the Christians but against their treasured sacred writings, their enemies thus hoping to stamp out even the slightest traces of Christianity. The three oldest manuscripts now in existence are known as the Sinaitic, the Alexandrian and the Vatican manuscripts. The Sinaitic was found by the eminent Bible scholar, Tischendorf, in a convent on Mount Sinai in 1844. It contains the Septuagint, other parts of the old Testament, the New Testament complete and some of the apocryphal books. The writing, after a lapse of more than 1,500 years, is still clear and legible. The Alexandrian manuscript, which came to light in 1628, is not quite so ancient as the Sinaitic. It has the Old Testament complete, except that ten leaves are missing, and the New Testament lacks nearly thirty leaves. It is in the British Museum. The Vatican manuscript—the most ancient of all—is a great treasure, consisting of about 700 leaves of vellum bound in book form. Part of Genesis is missing and also a number of the Psalms. The New Testament is complete up to Hebrews, ninth chapter. Other early Bible manuscripts of great value, but inferior to the three mentioned, are the Codex Ephraem and the Codex Bezæ, besides which there is a long list of later manuscripts.

S. J. F., Tarrytown, N. Y. Respect for age is a fine trait of character and a mark of the true Christian as well. We cannot conceive of one having the spirit of Christ in the heart, who would willingly wound the feelings of the aged, either by speech or manner. A kind consideration, a sympathetic interest and a readiness to help, wherever possible, or to do any little act or speak any word that might make life pleasanter to our old friends, or even to the aged stranger—these are the points by which we may distinguish the man or woman of character and proper training.

E. L. B., Asheville, N. C. There are many varieties of taste in the world. Most folks like flowers, yet there are others who sicken at their perfume. One would think that genuine poetry would please every literary taste, but there are many who seem to prefer homely rhymes or even plain doggerel.

Mrs. S. J., Smolan, Kan. The passage you refer to is Prov. 30 : 8, 9.

A Solid Wall of Good Will

Nothing has ever disturbed the demand for this car.

Not for a month, not for a week, not for a single day.

Having only one car to build, Dodge Brothers have been able to build it better and better.

But in the sense of radical changes, it is the same car today it was when they designed it.

And still the demand goes on growing greater and greater.

No outside conditions, no conditions inside the industry, seem to slow it up a particle.

The people want the car more intensely at this moment than they ever wanted it before.

This in the face of the fact that production is at the highest peak it has ever reached.

And in the face of the further fact that the sales—in a year and a half—have been more than sixty-three million dollars.

You can find out why this is so from what people are saying about the car all around you.

For months and months they talked particularly of its performance.

Now, you will hear even greater emphasis laid on its economy.

You will hear that with thousands of cars in use, Dodge Brothers dealers have practically no use for repair parts.

That rumor is true. Accidents are the chief source of demand for Dodge repair parts.

You will hear that the cost of maintenance is practically nil.

This too, is true in thousands of cases.

You will hear that the car consumes an unusually small amount of gasoline and oil.

This is literally true—of every Dodge Brothers car, under all conditions.

You will hear that it is very difficult to find Dodge Brothers cars for sale at second-hand anywhere.

You will also hear that the second-hand price is only a little lower than the first price.

Both of these things are true—not in one city, nor one state, but all over the Union.

You do not hear people talking about the price of the car.

But you do hear them talking everywhere about the kind of a car it is.

In short, wherever you find a Dodge Brothers car, you will find it surrounded by friends.

You will find it running from morning to night, in an atmosphere of good will.

No ill will anywhere, good will everywhere—good will that grows out of its good work.

No one knows the value of this good will any better than Dodge Brothers know it.

No one counts more on it, nor works harder to deserve it.

This is your guarantee when you buy one of Dodge Brothers cars—the great good will that all the owners feel toward it and the high value which Dodge Brothers place on that good will.

"You look like a new person

has made your skin so clear!"

"Yes, after years of experimenting with all sorts of things for my skin, I began to use Resinol Soap. In a very few days I could see a marked improvement.

"It seemed impossible that anything so simple as washing my face twice a day with hot water and a delightful toilet soap could do more good than all those tedious, expensive treatments, but the fact remains that now my complexion is clear, with the natural glow of health and youth that I feared it had lost for good."

If you are having trouble with your complexion, if you find that a pimply or otherwise unattractive skin is a handicap in your social or business life, what wouldn't you give to be able to say what that girl said?

Try Resinol Soap a week and you will know why you will want it the year round. The soothing, healing Resinol medication in it reduces the tendency to pimples and oiliness, soothes irritated pores, offsets the ill-effects of cosmetics, and brings out the real beauty of the complexion. It is equally effective in protecting delicate skins from the havoc of summer's sun, heat and dust.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown being entirely due to the Resinol medication. Resinol Soap and Resinol Ointment are sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a free sample of each write to Dept. 12-K, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Resinol Shaving Stick also contains the Resinol medication, so that it soothes and refreshes the face, while supplying a rich, creamy, slow-drying lather. It makes daily shaving a real pleasure.

Questions and Answers

MRS. W., Chicago, Ill. In speaking of Christ to a friend, am I doing wrong to present him as Friend and Counselor and Guide, and to try to win that friend by showing him the very attractiveness of Christ, by picturing the Christian life as it is in my own experience, a happy, glad existence, and trying to make him want it just because it is such a beautiful thing? A friend says that a person must first be made to realize his sinfulness.

God has used that same method in many portions of his Word—trying to draw people to himself by stating the delights of salvation. The "land flowing with milk and honey" is the type of the soul experience into which God waits to lead his people. "Ho, every one that thirsteth," he pleads, "come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat: yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price" (Isa. 55: 1). "At thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore," the psalmist sings (Ps. 16: 11). As a matter of fact a glad, ringing testimony to abundant blessings received will often do more than anything else to bring an unbeliever under conviction for sin. When he realizes God's great love and the plans he has made for his blessing, even at the awful cost of Calvary, he will feel guilty, indeed, and long for the joy which the believer has found. Of course there are cases in which a wrongdoer should be rebuked for his sin. The Holy Spirit and a sanctified judgment will guide safely in such cases. But do not allow yourself to be troubled and perplexed by the criticisms of others. That might result in your losing your happy, sunny experience. Keep that experience at all costs. Cast not away your confidence. Go on your happy way, telling others how happy Christ has made you. Perhaps you can win even your criticizing, captious friend to a richer, deeper experience, which will make him a sunny Christian too.

J. D. L., Romulus, N. Y. When a person does wrong and really thinks he is doing right, what is the difficulty? Has he a wrong conscience or a wrong reason?

A wrong reason. That is, his reasoning powers have not worked correctly, or according to facts. Conscience seems to be closely akin to the practically universal instinct of worship, and capable of being misguided in just the same way. People of all races feel the impulse to worship, but until the mind receives knowledge of the true God that impulse will be misdirected. Just so conscience tells us that there is a difference between right and wrong and that we must do right, but the mind needs to be instructed as to what is right and what is wrong. This instruction comes from the study of the Bible, from the study of human history and the facts of present-day living, and from direct communications from the Holy Spirit. Sometimes the mind is mistaken as to the identity of the Holy Spirit's voice, thinking messages come from him which are merely echoes of other voices or of subconscious experiences. The best way to have a well-instructed conscience and to be able to detect the Holy Spirit's voice when he speaks is to keep in close touch with spiritually minded friends, to pray much, to study the Bible, and to give oneself energetically to hard work for the spiritual, mental and physical welfare of others.

E. B., Midland, Pa. Maurice Maeterlinck is a Belgian poet, dramatist and essayist. He is characterized by a rare beauty of style and depth of thought, his dramas portraying thought and motive rather than action. He is something of a philosopher, but does not claim to be a religious teacher, so the question of orthodoxy could hardly be raised in connection with his work. Much of his work is instructive and helpful; it is tinged by melancholy, and he seems to miss the joyousness of Christianity.

Reader, Mo. 1. Why is the law the strength of sin? I Cor. 15: 56. 2. How should we repent, by plucking the fruits from the tree of sin ere they ripen, or should we lay the ax to the root of the tree itself?

1. The law is the strength of sin, because if it were not for the law we would not have the sense of sin. The law may exist either in the form of statute or in the form of conscience, but it is the existence of this law that reveals and measures the strength of sin. Indeed it almost seems that law provokes many people to sin, the human mind and will revolting from any sort of authority. It can readily be seen that if the law were abrogated there would be no sense of sin, and indeed no such thing as sin. Paul's teaching throughout the Epistles is not that the law is abrogated, but that the soul of the believer is filled with love for the Law-maker and receives from the Law-maker divine power to keep the law. It is important, however, to remember in studying Paul that by "law" he sometimes means the ceremonial law, which is literally abrogated by the Gospel, and sometimes moral law, which is not abrogated, but established, Romans 3: 31. 2. Repentance means a sincere sorrow for past sin. But this sorrow cannot be sincere unless it is accompanied by determination not to sin again. In this sense your implication is quite correct, namely, that repentance should take us down to the very roots of our motives, and that these must be purified by the power of God.

E. B. P., Exeter, N. H. There is probably no rule in human experience without its exceptions, and the case you mention is exceptional. Within recent years a pastor, well known and very successful in his spiritual work, left the ministry and for several years taught strange doctrines. He was led by the Spirit to see his error, however, returned to the fold, and is now laboring earnestly on sound Gospel lines. If he had died during his wandering in the wilderness, it might have been said of him, as of your friend, that he had renounced all faith and that his career ended in darkness. And yet it might not have been actually true. No one knows of the struggle that may be going on in such a soul, torn by the temptation to remain in unbelief on the one hand and, on the other, hearing the Spirit's call to repent and return. We should be slow to pass judgment in such cases. God alone knoweth the heart.

Many Readers. Who wrote the books of the New Testament?

The gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John were written by the men whose names they bear; Acts by Luke; Epistles from Romans to Philemon by Paul; the Epistle to the Hebrews by Apollos, Paul and some unknown writer; James by James, the brother of Jesus, not James, the son of Zebedee, John's brother; the Epistles of Peter and John by these apostles; Jude, by Jude, the brother of Jesus and James; Revelation by John.

E. J. G., Cortland, Neb. Where was Jesus from his boyhood to the beginning of his ministry? One well educated Mohammedan claims that he was in Tibet, being taught by the priests.

It is very clear that Jesus spent his boyhood and early manhood at Nazareth. Luke 4: 16 mentions Nazareth, as the place where he had been brought up. This added to the statement of his having come to live at Nazareth in infancy and that he was known there as the "Carpenter" (Mark 6: 3) and "the carpenter's son" (Matt. 13: 55), and was spoken of throughout his life as Jesus of Nazareth, are conclusive proofs on this point. History gives no sanction to the preposterous legend to which you refer.

N. J. T., Bladen, Neb. 1. While it is true that some deny that immortality is inherent in the soul of man, yet admit that it is conferred as the gift of God upon all who believe and yield acceptable obedience, the Christian Church teaches the doctrine on this subject which is clearly set forth in the Scriptures—that the lives of all are to be decided at the judgment, for a future existence of bliss or woe. The great point to be kept in view, therefore, is as to the choice between an eternity of happiness and continuous progress, realizing the noblest aims, or an eternity of exclusion from every blessing and filled with remorse. Paul pictures immortality as a "prize" to be struggled for with all courage and self-denial, looking to divine grace to accept our efforts, and realizing that through our own merits we can never prove worthy of it and that it must come as a "gift," bestowed on us through the merits of Jesus Christ, our Saviour and Mediator. 2. As all Americans, irrespective of race, religion, or social condition, are on an equality before the law, it is clearly wrong to discriminate against anyone on any of these grounds. Religion should not be dragged into politics, and especially should a policy be sharply rebuked which aims to make religion serve the partisan ends of any political party or candidate.

A. G. K., Williamsport, Pa. 1. The "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2: 2) is held to mean the old adversary, Satan, who assails humanity with trials and temptations. The figure employed in the phrase quoted is that of an evil spirit, in whose existence all religions, pagan as well as Christian, agre 2. Angels (derived from a word which both in Hebrew and ek means "messenger") is a term applied to a class of spi ial beings, or heavenly intelligences, employed as ministers he divine will. As to their number we may gather an impr ou from such passages as Dan. 7: 10; Matt. 26: 53; Luke 3; Heb. 12: 22, 23. We learn also from the Bible that the are divided into distinct classes of many different grades. Of eir origin the Bible says nothing, but it indicates their immor ty (Luke 20: 36). The operations of nature are referred as being under their direction, fulfilling God's will.

M. L. E., Huntington Beach, Calif. Paul, it is believe nherited Roman citizenship from his father. It had pro bly been conferred on some of his ancesters for services render to the Roman State. The fact of his being a native of Tar , a "free city" of Rome, had nothing to do with it.

W. J. E., Louisville, Ky. The question whether or not is ever justifiable has often been debated. Many ingenio attempts have been made to defend lying in certain ci nstances, when to tell the truth might result in great inju or personal danger to the innocent. The Scriptures, how er give an unmistakable note on the subject. The devil i denounced as the "father of lies." God hates a liar, and sehood is expressly condemned in many passages, including hn 8: 44; I Tim. 1: 9, 10; Rev. 21: 27 and 22: 15. Christ er spoke an untruth, nor any statement that would lead an untrue impression. It should not be forgotten, however at keeping silence, when to tell the truth might prove inju us, is not condemned. What society calls "necessary" li or "white lies," must be included in the category of cond ation, trivial though they may appear. As to lying in a at emergency, to save life, or property, or reputation, or fri ls, it may be set down as a rule for the conscientious Chr an that, if we have faith in God, we can plant ourselves sq ly upon that faith and tell the truth, fearing not, trusting hi for the outcome. A true Christian, with a firm consciousn of God's presence and knowledge, will not lie. As to th es mentioned in the Bible, they are given as a matter of r d, yet with no indication of approval.

J. McB., Huntington, N. Y. The martyrs in the first ntury A.D. were Christians simply. The word "Cath ," which appears in the creed, means "universal." The R an Catholic Church was not then in existence.

L. G. S., Coalgate, Okla. Please explain the words of Je to Thomas: "Because thou hast seen me thou hast beli d; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet hav believed."

A faith that only trusts so far as it can see plainly an eel strongly is scarcely faith at all. Faith has in it the elem of risk, of daring, of venturing into the unknown, of trustin he word, the virtue, the character, the power of another, en when appearances seem to contradict. The men and w en who have achieved great things for God are those who ke the heroes mentioned in the eleventh chapter of Hebrew believed in the face of appalling difficulties and dangers. re was very little of real faith in the attitude of Thomas. H ad proofs that could not be mistaken nor doubted. On the er hand Jesus said that those who would venture to trus im without these visible and tangible proofs would be espe lly blessed, because their faith was big and strong. Then o, he wished, doubtless, to emphasize the fact that those ho were to come later would have in every way as great an o ortunity of being blessed and helped by him as those wh aw him in the flesh or in his resurrected body. There have en saints through all the Christian centuries and some are ng now whose sense of Christ's companionship and blessin nd help is as real as that of the apostles. And this experie of realizing his nearness and helpfulness is available for ever ne who will really trust him.

Mrs. S. J. G., Lewiston, Me. Please inform me if the P stants are so called because they were protestants a st the Catholic religion and language; also if our Prot nt Bible was not taken originally from the Catholic Bil

Protestants were so called because they protested a st the errors and corruption of the church of that age and a ist the assumption of the Roman hierarchy to govern the ole church. We do not understand what you mean by prot ng against the Catholic language. Perhaps we have misread ur letter. There was, of course, no Catholic language, a he Christians of various countries speaking the tongue of th nd of their birth or residence. The priests, to be sure, all ed Latin, but that could not be called the Catholic lang ge. It is not correct to say that the Protestant Bible was en originally from the Catholic Bible, except that the a nt manuscripts were of course the property of the united c ch before the separation of the eastern and western branc or of Protestant from Catholic. Luther made his German tr lation of the Bible direct from the Greek Testament an he Septuagint (he is said not to have made much use the Hebrew text of the Old Testament). The King James Ve on, made in 1611, was taken from the Hebrew and Greek m uscripts. The Town of Don't-You-Worry

By Rev. J. J. Bartlett D.D.

There's a town called Don't-You-Worry,
On the banks of River Smile,
Where the Cheer-up and Be-Happy
Blossom sweetly all the while.
Where the Never-Grumble flower
Blooms beside the fragrant Try,
And the Ne'er-Give-Up and Patience
Point their faces to the sky.

In the valley of Contentment,
In the province of I-Will,
You will find this lovely city,
At the foot of No-Fret hill.
There are thoroughfares delightful
In this very charming town;
And on every hand are shade trees
Named the Very-Seldom-Frown.

Rustic benches, quite enticing,
You'll find scattered here and there;
And to each a vine is clinging
Called the Frequent-Earnest-Prayer.
Everybody there is happy,
And is singing all the while,
In the town of Don't-You-Worry,
On the banks of River Smile.

The Mexican Situation

PRESIDENT WILSON did not wait for an official report regarding the engagement at Carriza but on June 24 demanded of e Carranza government thr gh James Linn Rodgers, special agent at Mexico Cit the release of the prisoners and the property of t United States taken by the Mexicans in this acti . On the same day, Mr. Arredondo, ambassad of the Carranza government at Washington, pre ted a note to the American State Department, n ich the attention of this government was called to t orders previously given to General Trevino not to p mit American forces to move east, west or south, sha ng that the engagement at Carrizal was the resu of the disregard of these orders by American troo s, which were therefore attacked by the Mexicans. On une 25 Secretary Lansing sent to Mr. Rodgers a fo al note to be delivered to the Carranza governmer in which he stated that this communication of Mr Arredondo under instructions from his governmer admitted of no other construction than that it was formal avowal of deliberately hostile action. Mr Rodgers was instructed to demand of General Car nza the immediate release of the prisoners taken n t encounter at Carrizal, together with any property of the United States taken with them. The nu er of prisoners held was twenty-four. He was inst cted also to inform Carranza that "the United Sta s expects an early statement from your governme as to the course of action it wishes the governmer of the United States to understand it has deter ned upon." This note had every element of an ulti atum except the element of time.

C tain Lewis S. Morey, who had bee practically given up as lost at Car zal, finally returned to the Am ican lines on June 26. Captain Mo y was wounded by a shot in the houlder and left the scene of bat with three negro troopers, goi about two miles. Their can ens were empty Captain Morey was very weak from loss of blood. He therefore wrote a report of the engagement, which he gave to the three troopers and ordered them to abandon him. They left him lying in a depression in the desert. A detachment of the Tenth Cavalry under Lieutenant Henry A. Meyer found them wandering about on the desert. Lieutenant Meyer rushed back to camp with the report, and a screen of troops was sent out to bring in Captain Morey. Although severely wounded, Captain Morey had managed to make his way to a ranch house, where he was found by a detachment of the Eleventh Cavalry under command of Major Jenkins. One of the non-commissioned officers took from the body of Captain Boyd, killed at Carrizal, his notebook, which shows that he requested passage through the town on a peaceful mission and that he was invited by General Gomez to parley. The evidence of the Boyd notebook clinches the charge of Mexican treachery. The latest official reports of the action show that eighty-four Americans were concerned in the fighting, and that they fought until their ammunition was exhausted. Lieutenant Adair was killed in an attempt to replenish the ammunition from the pack animals which had been stationed in the rear of the fighting line.

National Guardsmen of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Illinois and Wisconsin started for the border June 26 and 27. The troop trains were given right of way over all other traffic, and army officers estimated that by July 1 there would be at least 10,000 militia at the border and at least 50,000 by a week later. The American Red Cross is ready for any emergency.

Another picture that tells its own story, but has nothing to say about the poor fellows and their families these machine guns may plunge into woe—if the Mexicans don't get this American crew first

No information was given out as to the destination of the various units, as any information given to the American people would likewise become the property of the Mexicans, and if war is to be the outcome it is desirable that the Mexicans should not be informed as to the probable point of attack. Mexican troops were reported to be entrenching and to be placing cannon to resist American troops.

Various South American diplomats have interested themselves in the possibility of mediation, but Secretary Lansing expressed the opinion that there was nothing for the United States to arbitrate, and that it was up to Mexico. General Carranza has been reported as being willing to accept mediation "in principle."

The government has been assured by the manufacturers of motor trucks that trucks can be delivered at the rate of 500 a day if required; but this would mean the stopping of shipments abroad. Army officers are authority for the statement that there is plenty of arms and ammunition in the country to supply the National Guard and the Federal army, but that it will take some time to arm and equip the volunteer troops which may be called. It is said also that the bulk of the ammunition now being exported would be useless to our troops, as it would not fit our guns. The rifles being manufactured here for the Allies would also be useless to us, as experience has shown that all small arms must be of the same pattern. The War Department is arranging to supply to the arms manufacturers dies and specifications for proper equipment and supplies.

Except for a few who prefer to remain in Mexico, all American citizens were expected to be out of the country by July 1. Army transports and vessels of the active fleet have been busy in the last two weeks picking up refugees at the various ports of both coasts.

There appears to be a certain lack of unity of feeling among the Latin-American nations regarding the threatened war between Mexico and the United Sta . Brazil has never approved of the Carra a administration and opposed the recogni n of Carranza. The Argentine Repu e has also held back and has entered o no action looking toward mediation. e Latin-American nations apparently re - nize that the United States is taking y such steps as any sovereign nation w d be compelled to take in like circumstan ; and while regretting hostilities between e United States and a Latin-American st , they recognize that the sovereignty f Mexico is very lightly upheld by Mexi s among themselves, and that the gov - ment of Mexico is one in name only. - ports from Guatemala show that t little republic, Mexico's neighbor on e south, is nearly out of patience with e Carranza government because of depr - tions across the border similar to t e which have annoyed the United State Mexican bandits killed a rancher d his wife near Hachita, New Mexico, e y on the morning of June 27, driving ff the stock from the ranch. A poss f citizens took up the trail of the ban s and was later reinforced by U. S. cava .

General Carranza on June 28 ord d the release of the American troopers d in prison at Chihuahua and the twe - three soldiers with their equipment d their interpreter were put on a train r Juarez by General Trevino. Consider e pressure in the interest of peace had n brought to bear upon the Carranza gov - ment. Diplomats of other Latin repu s and influential business men advised - ranza that the United States was in ear t and that defiance meant war. The rel e of the prisoners encouraged Señor Ign o Calderon, the Bolivian minister at W - ington, and his colleagues to make fur r efforts in the interest of mediation, a q - tion which Secretary Lansing was unwil g to discuss while American soldiers e prisoners in Mexico.

A City Celebrates

By MARY KENDALL HYDE

SHIP ahoy! A light gleams dimly through the mellow shades of a summer evening. As it comes more plainly into view, it is discovered to be a lantern at the masthead of an ancient caravel. Closely follows a second ship, and yet a third, which is recognized as the Half-Moon. From the mists above the river comes a whisper teng the wondering onlookers that the weird vessels are th of the early discoverers of America, Cabot, Verazza, and Hendrik Hudson.

hile yet the phantom ships are passing out of sight, fight on the opposite shore reveals a great group of Irans dancing. Another ancient craft appears and las its company in spite of the protests of the Indians. Rrt Treat and his companions have come to found ut the banks of the Passaic River a town where they m worship God and maintain a form of government su as their consciences approve.

BY means of such picturesque pageantry have the citizens of Newark, N. J., been reviewing and reling its early history, in recognition of the fact that ju two hundred and fifty years have passed since a nd of voyagers arrived from the shores of Connicut to establish a colony where all affairs should beadministered "according to God and a godly germment." Newark claims the distinction of bg founded by men of such super-Puritan convictis as to exceed the Puritans of New England by my degrees, even measured by the bluest of "blue las." The state of Connecticut had adopted a constition providing that any freeholder, whether he w a church member or not, might hold office and ve. This provision was regarded by a certain elemt as "Christless and profane," and therefore the exlus in the spring of 1666.

he Founders were Congregationalists, and for the fir fifty years the church was the state, and the state tl church. The meeting-house dominated the life othe settlement. "For seventy-five years, in order tcote or hold office, one had to be a member of th Congregational Church. In fact, no one was rcived as a 'member of the town' without a certifice of membership in the Congregational Church." En the traveler passing through the town was reiired to "give religious proofs" before he could ohin rest and refreshment at the tavern, whose koer was warned against entertaining strangers "liscriminately." The town constable was expeed to see that liars and all "disobedient and refrtory persons" should "quietly depart the town sconably."

he Congregational Church controlled the town of Nvark until the year 1720, when the Presbyterians tk the leadership. The Episcopalian Church was eblished about the middle of the century. Today the are in the present city of 400,000 population 1 churches, including Protestant, Roman Catholic a Jewish.

celebration of unprecedented magnitude to mark tl two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the foundiof the city was determined upon nearly two years ag by a committee of one hundred of the representati men of Newark. The public responded to the sgestion with remarkable unanimity, and plans we made for five months of civic festivities. The su of $250,000 was contributed by individuals, a $1,500,000 raised publicly by a bond issue to cer the cost of a Memorial Building, the cornerste of which is to be laid before the close of the celebion. A series of spectacular events is filling the mths from May 1 to October 1. Pageants, songs, fi and track events, industrial exhibitions, parades, cventions, military exercises and school exhibits a telling the story of Newark's progress. It is a dnatic and forcible way of teaching history to the pent generation.

NATURALLY the heart of the anniversary centered in the religious observances. The first ohese occurred in the Old First Church, which was crded to its capacity when "Founders' Day" was oerved. There were addresses by the mayor of Nvark and the governors of New Jersey and Conticut, who with their staffs resplendent in gold lace ocpied the pulpit platform. Rev. W. J. Dawson, L., the pastor, delivered an eloquent oration. On a ther evening in the Old First the typical prayer nting of colonial days was reproduced. An oldti melodeon wailed forth ancient hymn-tunes wse words from the Bay Psalm Book were sung, ar being "lined out" by the chorister. All the picipants were dressed in costumes of olden days. T service was conducted throughout with perfect dity and sobriety, characterized by not the slightest show of levity, resulting in a peculiarly realistic impression.

On another Sunday a mammoth union religious service was held in the amphitheater in Weequahic Park, where 15,000 persons assembled, Hebrews, Catholics and Protestants, as children of one Father, to praise him for past guidance and to seek his blessing for the future.

It was in this same amphitheater during the following week that an audience of 45,000 persons gathered night after night under the June sky to witness the community pageant, one of the most ambitious undertakings of the kind ever presented. It was produced and enacted by Newark people for Newark people, "for a better understanding of what Newark has been and may be." The scenes of the pageant illustrated various periods in the history of the city, from the landing of Robert Treat in 1666 down through the times of the Revolution and the Civil War. The prologue reviewed the scenes previous to the coming of Treat, including the voyages of the early discoverers of the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and the native pastimes of the Indians. The closing masque was symbolic, showing the forces which have shaped the life of the city. Greed, Ignorance and Strife, with their brood of evil spirits, were depicted as tempting the Spirit of the City to desert the Church, the Law, and Liberty. According to Henry Wellington Wack, executive adviser of the Committee of One Hundred, it was the intention that "throughout the entire plot, the ecclesiastical history of Newark should carry its recurring message to the soul of the citizenry, like an old bell beloved from childhood to age."

Thomas C. B. Snell, lineal descendant of Robert Treat, posing for poster picture of his ancestor directing the landing at Newark in 1666

Four thousand Newarkers participated in the pageant. Several of the rôles, including that of Robert Treat, were filled by direct descendants of the characters they typified, original founders of the city. Seven hundred costumes, made from original designs, were constructed by the women of the city, who formed a voluntary sewing committee.

IT is doubtful which scene was the more impressive to the spectator who was not a Newarker—the tableaux vivants with their dusky Indians, sturdy Colonials, dainty maidens, and symbolic action on the one side of the lagoon which divided the actors from the audience, or the vast audience itself reaching tier upon tier from the greensward to the stars themselves (such was the effect) in this wonderful natural amphitheater. On one side, 4,000 loyal citizens enthusiastically portraying Newark's history; on the other side 40,000 equally loyal citizens with equal enthusiasm cheering on their fellows.

BELIEVING that "the helpful kind of patriotism is the kind that grows out of a knowledge of one's town," Newark's schools have for several years included in their curriculum a study of the city's history, growth, government and needs, with a view to its future welfare, beauty and healthfulness. The Public Library has cooperated by annual exhibits of books, pictures and historical relics, illustrating the history and institutions of the city. The Board of Education believes that "whoever is fighting intemperance, or gambling, or bribery, or waste, or dirt, or ugliness, whoever is working hard to make his country honest and clean and beautiful, is doing patriotic work. . . . Patriotism means service to our city as much as to our country. If we do not serve the little part of the country that we have seen, how can we serve the whole country which we have not seen? Patriotism must begin at home. The first duty of every patriot is to see that he is friendly to his neighbors, and that his own back yard and street and ward are just as clean and orderly as they can be." Newark's school exhibit shows that she paid $3,000,000 last year to educate her 70,000 pupils, maintaining four high schools, fifty-five elementary and two industrial; summer schools are maintained in two high and thirty elementary school buildings, and the experiment of "all-year schools" is being tried.

The June Walk, which is an annual festival in many of the churches of Newark, this year became a union affair. Sunday schools of several denominations marched from their churches to Military Park, where they were reviewed. Rev. Dr. Jesse L. Hurlbut was one of the reviewing officers. "The Sunday school a civic asset" was the slogan of the paraders.

Children's Sunday ushered in "Baby Week," which included sermons, lectures and exhibits on the care and training of infants and on the value of child hygiene. Dr. Julia Lathrop of the Children's Bureau in Washington was invited to address the women of the city at a mass meeting, on "The Proper Care of Babies." The orphans in the city institutions were not overlooked.

A striking feature of the Industrial Exposition held in the Armory was the section devoted to welfare work. Newark reports that it is spending more than $2,000,000 a year on its work of helping those members of the community who through illness, poverty, ignorance, or other causes beyond their control, need special assistance.

NEWARK'S Industrial Exposition was a matter of course. The city is no longer populated by farmers and agriculturists. It is now a powerful manufacturing city of 6,000 factories, turning out $250,000,000 worth of goods every year. The merchants of the city inaugurated a "Buy-It-in-Newark Week" which was a practical success. Labor has been honored throughout the anniversary. From its earliest days Newark has boasted its inventors. It claims to have produced the first malleable iron and the first patent leather in America, built the first locomotive engine to travel up-grade and the first electrical dynamo made in the world.

In the literary world, also, are to be found many for whom Newark was a home town. Richard Watson Gilder, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Mary Mapes Dodge, Marion Harland, Amanda Douglas, Noah Brooks, Thomas Dunn English, and Ray Palmer, author of "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," are a few of the names which have added luster to Newark's crown. Tom Moore and Washington Irving made some of the old mansions famous in their writings.

"Miss Newark," however, modestly disclaims celebrating in any spirit of vainglory. She states officially that she is celebrating "in the hope that her people may thereby be led to take note of themselves, to discover that they form a live and active thing, a Modern American City; that this live creature, their city, has its own potencies and powers, and that it can therewith do excellent things for its own people, and that it ought to do them. Newark celebrates, not because it is so excellent a city, but in the hope that it may become much more excellent"; in the hope that "a new vision may show us a city not only materially but spiritually and intellectually rich."

A Week in the World's News

Changes in China. Dispatches from Peking on June 24 stated that the Chinese cabinet had resigned, and that President Li Yuan Hung had refused to accept the resignations, although a complete cabinet change was inevitable within a fortnight, since the whole government was being reorganized. The Chinese treasury is reported to be empty and to need an immediate loan, two propositions being before the Chinese chancellery, one from a group of American bankers, and one from Japanese. China is reported to be considering the restoration of the old canal system, of which there were at one time 60,000 miles within the empire. Centuries before the Christian era the great rivers of China were diverted from their natural courses, the waters of one turned into another's bed, and the waterways carried along in the direction of desired traffic. The ancient Grand Canal extends from Hangchou to Tientsin, traversing the provinces of Chekiang. Kiangsu, Shangtung and Chili, the total length of the canal being about 850 miles. China is in desperate need of transportation, and it has been estimated by engineers that the canal system can be restored at a less cost than that which would be involved in the building of the necessary railways. With the canals again in operation the railway building can go on at greater leisure. Morphia is said to be replacing opium in the life of China, an active organization for the smuggling of morphia into China being maintained in Japan. It is said that the Japanese dealers carry on the opium traffic quite openly, employing Chinese agents to carry a quantity of filled syringes, and inject the drug for three or four cents. The morphia habit is said to be spreading rapidly, and the profits to approximate a million pounds a year.

Millions of Bones. The Department of Commerce, Washington, reports the finding upon the Pribolof Islands of immense bone deposits which are capable of being converted into fertilizer. The deposits have not yet been fully surveyed. One deposit lying at the waterfront is a mile long and half a mile broad, with an average depth of about two feet. The present wholesale price of ground bone is $35 a ton. It is said that the principal problem of utilizing this deposit is one of transportation. There is plenty of native labor available upon the islands.

A Toy Strike, But a Real One. On June 22 the toymakers of New York laid down their tools and went on strike. They demand shorter hours, longer luncheon time, recognition of the union, and more pay. The thirty or forty shop-owners have formed an association and say they will not grant the union demands, which they claim are impossible. About 1,800 workers of the 2,000 in the industry are on strike. The toymakers of Germany are now too busy to worry over wax faces or hemp wigs, and the whole world of children is practically dependent upon the toy industry of the United States. The differences might well be submitted to Santa Claus.

A Declaration for Peace. The Ford Peace Party, now known as the Neutral Conference for Continuous Mediation, has recently issued a manifesto to the belligerent nations suggesting terms upon which might be based an international agreement which would end the war. Calling attention to the fact that the conference represents no government, but only the good will of the millions of people throughout the civilized world who desire the end of tho combat now raging, the conference declares that its first duty is to call attention to universal principles and concrete proposals upon which an agreement seems possible; and it suggests, therefore, that peace be organized upon the following principles: (a) The right of nations to decide their own fate; (b) economic guarantees, which means the recognition of the principle of the open door for commerce; (c) freedom of the seas; (d) parliamentary control of foreign policy; (e) international organization, which would include au agreement to submit all disputes between states to a peaceful settlement; (f) disarmament; (g) a world congress.

National Incorporation for Boy Scouts. On June 15 President Wilson signed a bill granting Federal incorporation to the Boy Scouts of America. The Federal charter will protect the phrase "Boy Scouts," as well as the scout uniform, emblems and badges. Figures on June 14 showed the number of registered boy scouts to be 183,271, of scout masters 8,621, against 140,831 and 6,442 a year ago.

Munitions Again Fatal. An explosion in the plant of the Canadian Explosives, Ltd., at Parry Sound, Ontario, June 21, resulted in the death of five workmen and the serious injury of twenty. Fire followed the explosion.

Coal Mine Fatalities in 1915. Some time ago the number of fatalities in mines other than coal mines in 1915 was given in this department. A later report from the Bureau of Mines shows that the number of fatalities in coal mines during the year was 2,266. The 1914 record was 2,454. The fatality rate for 1915 was 2.95 per thousand men employed. The production of coal for the year was 518,000,000 tons, the production for 1914 having been 513,525,477 tons. During the year there were eleven mine disasters, in which five or more men were killed, the total deaths due to such disasters being 262. The lowering of the number of fatalities is due in part to closer and more careful inspection by the state authorities, and in part to a better enforcement of laws and regulations by the operators, to the efforts of the miners' organizations to reduce accidents, to an educational campaign in the interests of safety-first, to more general use of safety lamps, to the use of permissible explosives, to the humidifying of dusty mines, and to first-aid and rescue training.

Petroleum Output in Oldest Field. The petroleum output for 1915 in the Appalachian field, which includes Pennsylvania, New York, southeastern Ohio, West Virginia and Kentucky, was 22,860,048 barrels, a decrease of five per cent. from the output of 1914. The average price decreased 33 cents to $1.55 a barrel. The total market value of the oil was $35,468,973. A total of 5,197 wells were completed in the district, of which 2,905 yielded oil, 1,254 gas, and 1,038 gave no return.

Roosevelt Endorses Hughes. The Progressive National Committee met in Chicago on June 26 to fill the vacancy left by the refusal of Mr. Roosevelt to be the candidate of tho party. The committee had for consideration a letter from Mr. Roosevelt enthusiastically endorsing Mr. Hughes and recommending that he be made the candidate of the Progressive Party. This recommendation was concurred in by the committee by a vote of 32 to 6, nine members not voting. The vice-presidential candidacy of Mr. Parker of Louisiana was undisturbed, the Progressives endorsing only Mr. Hughes and not Mr. Fairbanks.

Election Riots in Panama. In a fight between the national police and members of the Chiari political pa , at Panama on June 25, during the pr ress of an election, two persons v e killed and eighteen persons were inju l, four of them policemen. The pc e had foiled an attempt to rush the p s. The election seems to have resulte n tho choice of Ramon Valdes as pr ident of Panama.

The production of si r reached 74,961,075 fine ounces, wi a value, computed at the average p e for the year, of $37,397,300. This a gain over the production of 191 f $6,503,900 in the value of gold duced, and 2,505,975 ounces in the si r production. The figures include Ala a.

Swat Him With Molasses. n many parts of the country energ ic "swat the fly" campaigns are in p ress many of which include the offe g to children of so much a hundred a pint for the dead flies. Piling Up The Cost. On June 27 e House passed the Army Appropria- n Bill. appropriating about $182,- 0,000, of which $25,000,000 was added cover extraordinary expense connec- l with the mobilization of the Guard. e total is $55,000,000 in excess of the my appropriations for the current ar, and the Senate is expected to add 00,000,000 more. The Military Af- rs Committee also introduced into e House on June 27 an urgent effi- ncy appropriation bill carrying more an $25,000,000 to cover the cost of bilizing the National Guard and the traordinary expenses already in- rred, of the army in Mexico. Over ,000,000 was appropriated for horses, arly $10,000,000 for transportation, 700,000 for clothing and camp uipment, and $1,600,000 for pay of e National Guard. The Navy Bill s been reported to the Senate carry- g an appropriation of $304,000,000. e total of the bill as passed by the use was $269,000,000. The bill pro- les for the immediate construction four dreadnoughts and four battle uisers, and contemplates the begin- g within three years of the construc- n of ten battleships, six battle cruisers, n scout cruisers, fifty destroyers, fif- n fleet submarines, seventy-five coast bmarines, four gunboats, one hospital ip, two ammunition ships, two fuel ships and one repair ship. The tal cost of all these vessels will be 02,582,214, which will make neces- ry the annual appropriation of about 60,000,000 for construction during e next three years.

A Bargain In Rails. On June 28 e Western Pacific Railroad was sold auction in Oakland, Calif., for $18,- 0,000. It is said that the road cost t less than $75,000,000.

Duma Upholds Prohibition. The ussian Duma began consideration on ne 28 of the bill providing for perma- nt prohibition of vodka. In Defense Of Our Flag. Secre- ry of State Lansing made public on ne 28 the note of the United States reply to the Austro-Hungarian note, ceived some weeks ago, in which the perial Government defended the bmarine attack upon the American eamer Searchlight on December 5 st. Secretary Lansing takes issue with e Austrian government, stating that e evidence of the Captain and crew nvinces this government that the stro-Hungarian Government had ob- ined an incorrect report of the attack the steamer. The American evi- nce shows that no shot was sent ross the bow of the steamer warning to stop. The steamer did not direct r course toward the submarine, but soon as the captain realized that he s attacked, he swung the vessel oadside and at right angles to the urse of the submarine in order to show neutral marking. The steamer also carried two large flags some distance above the waterline. The submarine commander admits that the steamer stopped her engines. The American note states that in the absence of other and more satisfactory explanation of the attack, the government of the United States is compelled to regard the conduct of the commander of the submarine as a deliberate insult to the flag of the United States and an invasion of the rights of American citizens, and he asks of the Austro-Hungarian Government that an apology be made, that the commander of the submarine be punished, and that reparation be made by the payment of a suitable indemnity.

Post Office Bill Passed. The annual Post Office Appropriation Bill was passed by the Senate June 29, and went to conference. The bill carried total appropriations of $322,000,000. The Senate substituted for the space method of figuring railroad compensation for mail transportation, as provided in the House bill, a provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission fix methods and rates of pay.

The Submarine Mail. A German submarine, the U-35, sailing from the Austrian port of Pola on a date not given, bearing an autographed letter from Emperor William to King Alfonso, entered the port of Cartagena, Spain, on June 21, delivered its letter and departed shortly before daylight on the 23d. A report that a similar message was to be delivered in like manner to President Wilson has not been borne out by the events.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

DURING the whole of the past week the northern, or Vollhynian, division of the scene of the Russian offensive has been the scene of very fierce and bitter struggles. To understand this fighting and the strategy the Germans have been using, a statement of the geographical position will be helpful.

Make a point and call it Lutsk; then about two inches above this point make another and call it Czartorysk, and the same distance below another, which call Brody. Now, about an inch directly to the left of the point called Lutsk make another which call Saturzy and connect all with lines. The resultant triangular figure represents roughly the line of battle on which the struggles of the past week have taken place.

The Germans, who have now considerably increased their forces here, have driven back the Russian advance to as, far as Saturzy, and since have contented themselves with applying only sufficient pressure along the line from this point to Brody to keep the Russians fully occupied and prevent their making any advance beyond this line, in which object they have been successful.

On the line running from Saturzy to Czartorysk the Germans, however, have twice seriously defeated the Russians, once on Monday to the west of Sokal, a point about half way between Saturzy and Czartorysk, and again at Limirviek and to the south thereof toward Lubstcha. As a result it seems probable that the Russians will be obliged to fall back well to the east of the Styr River, since above Kolki, on the east bank of the river, is already in German hands. From the above it will be seen that the Germans are adopting once more their favorite maneuver of holding the center and pinching the sides of the enemy's salient.

Along the Galician front, from Brody south to the juncture of the Strypa and Dniester Rivers, the fighting has not been as violent this week as last, and the positions have remained unchanged, so that from the beginning of their offensive to the present time the Russians have gained no ground at all in this sector.

Still farther south the Russians made a considerable effort to advance from Sniatyn, on the Pruth River, to the westward and capture Kolomea, which is the important railroad center of southeastern Galicia, but after an initial success and the capture of Zalasze, a town just to the west of Sniatyn, the Austrian resistance stiffened to such a degree that they were unable to make further progress.

In west Bukowina, along the Galician border, the Russians followed the railroad from Czernowitz to the town of Kirty and captured that town, but the Austrians, who withdrew to the heights west of the town, were able to prevent their further progress toward Galicia.

In southern Bukowina, the Russians made decided progress, and after capturning the town of Kimpolung, the last town of any importance in the south of the crown land, continued their progress and have now reached the northern ends of the passes leading through the Carpathians into Transylvania. Evidently this movement is intended largely for the political object of influencing Rumania.

On Wednesday, June 28, the curious spectacle was presented of two trials for treason going on simultaneously: in Berlin, where the socialist member, Dr. Liebknecht, was before the court, and in London, where Sir Roger Casement was on trial. Liebknecht was found guilty of "attempted treason" and condemned to 30 months' imprisonment, while Sir Roger was found guilty of high treason and sentenced to death by hanging. Sir Roger will probably appeal his case.

Persistent reports reach us from several quarters that a German commercial submarine carrying a cargo of dyes, et cetera, is due to arrive at some American port within the next few days. There is an old proverb to the effect that "seeing is believing," which seems highly applicable to these rumors.

In German East Africa the British and Belgians continue to gain ground at the expense of the Germans. These latter attempted to create a diversion by attacking the Portuguese, but failed in their object. Cut off as the Germans are from supplies and reinforcements, this campaign can have but one end.

On Sunday, June 25, the Italians lost an auxiliary cruiser, the Città de Messina, and the French a destroyer, the Fourche, torpedoed in Otranto Straits. This incident and that of the capture of the British steamer Brussels on Saturday, between the Hook of Holland and Harwich, by a German submarine, were the only maritime events of importance of the past week.

In Arabia a revolt against Turkish authority has been started under the auspices of some of the principal Arab chiefs, and had made considerable progress, according to reports, the cities of Mecca and Medina being said to have been captured by the rebels. For years past the rule of Turkey in this quarter of the world has been from time to time disputed, and it is, therefore, not very surprising that the local chiefs should have seized what looked like a favorable opportunity to gain complete independence.

The demobilization of the Greek army is reported to be proceeding normally, and the king, it is said, has fixed August 7 as the date for the new elections required by the Allies for the Boulé, or Greek parliament.

On the northern border of Greece the rival artilleries have been active during the past week, and the Bulgarians have at one or two points made local forward movements for the strategic improvement of their positions, but outside of collisions between patrols there have been no infantry actions,

Advertising the Church

By REV. CHRISTIAN F. REISNER, D.D

Pastor, Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, an Chairman of the Church Advertising Conference, Associated Advertising Clubs of the World Convention, Philadelphia, June 25-3

"CHRIST'S miracles were only the bell tolled to bring the people to hear his words," says Professor George Jackson, dean of an English theological school, in his book "The Preacher and the Modern Mind." In other words, the miracles were wrought to attract an audience to hear the Gospel. Herbert S. Houston, president of the National Advertising Clubs, in a published address says: "I saw the chains that held the Bible at Strasburg; robber barons ruled the Rhine and middle-age ignorance palled all. Then I recalled that the Gutenberg press originated across the street, and when it began printing the Bible for circulation darkness began to lift from the earth." Luther nailed his ninety-five theses where the largest public could read them. O. J. Gude aptly reminds us that the church steeple was the first regular and permanent outdoor advertising ever erected.

Organized religion never had as many competitors as now. Her leaders who sit down in smug satisfaction because people can come and hear the Gospel if they desire are not followers of their Master, but are Pharisees and blind leaders. When the invited guests failed to respond the host said: "Go out in the byways and hedges and compel them to come in." He created a sensation with a whip, that caused talk and brought an audience. He preached from a boat to the people gathered by the novelty. He fed 5,000 with a lad's lunch of sardines and soda crackers so that they could remain to an after meeting. Can anyone imagine him preaching to empty seats if a modern, unusual or even criticized form of publicity would gather an audience?

ONE of the earth's greatest evangelists said confidentially to the writer recently: "I never saw church work so hard to do or so discouraging. If I did not believe in the soon coming of Christ, I would give up." That is far too pessimistic. But Americans are wonderfully well satisfied with themselves. Prosperity has exaggerated egotism until the organized church is counted a hospital for the morally weak and wounded. Sin is delusion, or ignorance, which will cure itself. Social service as expressed by laws, loans and labor is an all-sufficient Saviour. Hence church attendance lags while there is no open antagonism for the church. A daily newspaper in a town with a fair moral and religious tone and the capital of a great state counted the Sunday morning attendance of thirty-three churches. Out of 15,138 members there were present 873 men, 1,864 women and 288 children, a total of 3,025. This is a fair sample in countless places, and it is usually as bad in smaller towns as in cities. But places of amusement are filled nightly through good advertising.

"It is beneath the dignity of the church to advertise," protests one churchman. "It makes religion cheap to put its appeal alongside that of biscuits, beer, braid and bran," charges another. An empty church cheapens the cause as does an empty store its owner, vastly more than can any consistent publicity that fills it. The late James Creelman told the writer that when he interviewed Pope Leo XIII the Cardinal Prince Hohenlohe said: "We are not worried by the circumscribed quarters of the Vatican, but we are afraid if we do not get much publicity for him the people will forget him, and so we covet the aid of the press." The Canadian government admitted in an investigation that $70,000 had been expended during a year in the United States for advertising space; but it brought in 100,000 American farmers. Fifteen years ago it would have been undignified for any bank to advertise. Today none neglect to do so, and by this means have developed a thrift and a spirit of economy otherwise impossible. There are sane and unobjectionable methods for churches.

"I want my religion and my business to be different. Advertising secularizes the church," said a conservative church official to his pastor. The Word exhorts, "Whether ye eat or drink, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." Religion, if it is a leaven, ought to be strong enough to spiritualize the things it touches, rather than itself to be deteriorated. Seventy-eight ministers from varied sections and de ninations were asked: "Is church advertising as n ssary and fruitful as advertising is in busine ?" Seventy-five answered "yes."

WE employ pertinent publicity to secure e tment in our army and navy. State Un rsities employ publicity agents to secure students A few years ago a young Wisconsin farmer struck ut for a business career. He thought of a catchy c yright for stockings, and built a big business. He as an officer of the Epworth League. He propose to popularize missions and wanted to print a c ap library on the subject. It would require $7,000 tlay at once. He put it up, and brought a young an from Drew Theological Seminary to manage he Missionary Publicity Bureau. That young ma S. Earle Taylor, is now in charge of the Missionary epartment of the Methodist Church, spending one id one-half millions a year, and is doing some of the st publicity work in the country.

"What can I do to get a night audience?" ask a small-town minister of a modern city pastor. "T in the children of the Sunday school to giv an evening program," was the answer. "C l can do that," he interposed. "Then adv se it," continued the advice. The minister's ce fell as he said, "If I advertise they will call a sensationalist!" That frightened him awa as it has hundreds of others. Dr. R. S. cArthur, for fifty years pastor of Calvary ptist Church, New York, said, "There is a nsationalism that is eminently commenda ." General Booth years ago told a prot er against his methods: "You can't preac to people unless they get within the range of ur voice."

The Life Extension Institute, a semi-c ritable organization of which ex-President ft is president, declares that two out of t ee adults are ill without knowing it, and at prompt treatment will prolong their lives n ny years. That fact is true morally. The ch ch must be the moral physician. Who would c ry the advertising of a real remedy for sick hu an bodies? Then why not widely adverti a sure cure for sin-sick souls?

THE test of church publicity lies in its p er to really and vitally build up a ch h. Emerson's noted paragraph has had t be changed as follows: "If a man can wri a better book, preach a better sermon, or ma a better mouse-trap than his neighbor, thoug he build his house in the woods, the world ill make a beaten path to his door--provide he advertises." How does this apply to he church?

The Health Department of New York f d that the city had a public bath capacit of 17,000,000 a year, while only 3,581,000 ap ed for the privilege. The city spent $153 in dvertising in one small section and increase he usage 1,896, which would mean nearly do e. Yet, some good men shrink from advert ng the fountain that cleanses from sin. n impersonal but direct invitation, yet every el ent of strength in the Sunday Evening Club is ayed up to its full publicity value. First, it is nducted by business men; next, it is popular. I eatures inspiration and fellowship, two things th every man wants, more especially the man a y from home. The list of famous speakers is erhaps open to question, but the poster makes n definite promise and can prove an alibi. S ring music, that appeals to us all, and the last li "Strangers Welcome, 'Sunday Clothes' Not a of its size in the country. Why? Its librarian, J Dana, advertises extensively; one million books, o five a minute, are taken out, over 1,000 questions a ay are answered, many of them by telephone. T church is custodian of a divine library: can the c rch learn something from the N vark institution?

It is the seeing of the same message on every bulletin board that gives poster advertising its "pull" and its "push." The Rev. L. H. Caswell has therefore decided to give no man a chance to say he wasn't asked.

he First Baptist Church, H tford, had a Sunday night a ience of eighty. A publicity c mittee was organized, and n a great audience greets the p acher. Calvary Presbyterian C rch, Buffalo, found the same r ult after ten months, and rec ed eighty new members. Rev. L E. Weigle, D.D., a Lutheran p tor, brought his evening audie of seventy up to five hund l in a few weeks, and at Easter r ived sixty new members. B ghamton merchants offered t churches all their regular s e for one Saturday; church a ertisements filled the paper, a Sunday the increase was t ty per cent. A group of S ttle business men promised to d the publicity work for two w ks of special meetings to be c ducted by three downtown p tors. They hired a brass band, p aded, burned red fire on street c ers, bought space in daily p ers, and filled the church. T ee thousand persons signed c ls and five hundred became m bers. B. M. Brown, a lay p acher, bought one hundred d ars' worth of space in a Chic o paper and printed therein t Bible verses found in 1 Thess nians 4:13 to chapter 5:7. T next day two business men met him to announce that as a result they would be avowed Christians. Gipsy Smith tells in his biography of preaching to a few hundred in a town. Then he hired a brass band and paraded, and after that 5,000 attended. The Salvation Army complain that the motion pictures out-pull their attractions for the drunkard. The six-reel picture "From the Manger to the Cross" has led to the conversion of scores when used a reel at a time and followed by a sermon Sunday night.

Church Calendars

One of the many exhibits at the Philadelphia Conference

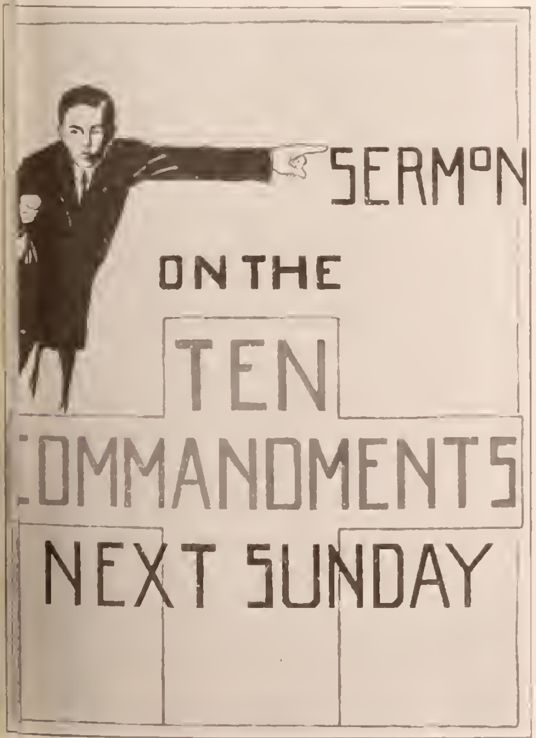
All other public men appear by name in the daily press, so must the minister if his purpose is to exalt his church and the "cause." Newspaper men are friendly. Baseball gives the newspaper owners almost no money in advertising, and yet controls page after page. The church will some day show its news-giving value. Pictures of church events are very attractive to the press. A Hope, Ark., paper is printing whole books of the Bible, several chapters appearing in each edition.

When finances make it possible, display space on other than the church page is very valuable. One church carried three inches on the sporting page of the New York Tribune on Saturday, phrased in baseball language. Brewers' money inserted the following:

"Alexander the Great drank beer and conquered the world before he was 32. Perhaps he could have done it sooner if he had not drunk beer, but you'd better take no chances."

The next day the reply appeared:

"Alexander the Great died in a drunken debauch at the age of 33. You'd better take no chances. Anti-Saloon League of New Jersey."



F ters like this can be made practically for any church in existence

ALL church advertising must have a strong personal flavor, the mark of all efficient publicity. A Denver merchant took to Europe the names of all his boy patrons and sent them a card from abroad. That captivated the interior lads. Bishop Leete, while a pastor, wrote each of his 1,800 members at Central Church, Detroit, a postal card while traveling through Europe. A Yankee opened a new store with life and energy next door to a sleepy competitor. The neighbor put out a sign, "Established 50 years." The Yankee followed: "Established yesterday; no old stock." A Jewish rabbi put on the bulletin board of his Fifth Avenue synagogue the sermon subject, "A Monument to a Dog." Folks looked; he preached on child care instead of dog care. Le Bas worked all night to get twenty phrases to use in his first recruiting publicity campaign. Then he worked all day to cut these down to one. It is important to word church advertising just right; it counts.

"More people joined the church that were traceable to billboards than to any one other kind of publicity used," said a New York pastor. They can be placed once or twice a year in towns large or small. Permanent painted stands near much frequented locations are full of drawing power. An Oklahoma church gave young plants to all reliable applicants early in the season, and in full bloom time held a chrysanthemum exhibition with red and blue ribbon awards. This was the talk of the town for weeks. An Iowa smaller city church placed a drinking fountain with iced water in summer in a prominent location; drinkers saw the church's name with grateful memory. Many churches are now running free motion pictures for children on Saturday afternoon, thus sending home scores of enthusiastic children to talk about that church.

The Marchers

UP from the city streets, lined with eager crowds, rises the rhythmic sound of marching feet. Our citizen soldiers are passing on their way to the front. They have come from the shop, the office, the factory, the counting-room, laying down their ordinary avocations to respond to the summons to national service. With brave and smiling faces they tramp on, responding with grateful glances to the cheers of the crowd, while hearts are breaking with the sorrow of the parting. And this scene is repeated in a hundred American cities today. Our hosts are marching, marching, marching—their destination the border, their future in the hand of God. As they pass by, prayers go up silently that they may return safe and victorious; that war after all may be averted, but if it should come, that it may spare them to home and dear ones.

In these trying days, there are so many things to pray for. It would seem that almost the whole world is necessitous. But business anxieties, health, personal desires of the ordinary kind, are all more or less forgotten in the great, overwhelming desire that our soldier boys may not, after all, be compelled to face the horrors of war. The nation has a universal yearning for peace; and it cannot yield up its sons in this fashion, nor send them off without feeling that to very many others the passing pageant may be one where—

Hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating
Funeral marches to the grave.

Life is a march from dawn to sunset. We cheer others and strengthen ourselves by singing along the way. And if we are loyal to the Great Commander, and keep his standard well in view, it will not be toilsome on the road, and the end will be, not war, but the blessedness of peace.

Does Your Soul Sing?

THE boy whistles at his chores. Some people, especially Christian people, have the habit of singing at their work. It is a sad thing that so many people outgrow or neglect the boyish habit of whistling or the Christian habit of singing. It usually means that as life goes on, with its hardness, with the monotony of its achievements or the disappointment of its failures, music dies out of the soul.

When this has happened, when the soul's music has fled, it is time to begin life over again. The past methods have been wrong. There must be a new start. Christ's plan of life is that it shall be to the accompaniment of sweet music, springing up in the soul that he has blessed.

Life's sorrows must not, need not, stop life's music. There is strange and powerful pathos in the simple statement that at the close of the Last Supper, after the sad talk about the separation that was to come, when the Master's will was firmly set for shame and agony and death, he stood with his disciples and sang a hymn before going out to the Mount of Olives. Indeed, all through the previous talk, which might well have been punctuated with tears, there were notes of joy. A world denying him, a nation, a city rejecting him, a mob about to slay him, a friend about to betray him, a group of companions about to forsake him, Jesus could still speak about his joy, and offer it to those who would take it into their souls.

Paul puts joy second in his list of the fruits of the Spirit. The New Testament is a book of joy. These souls, the first to be redeemed from sin by the power of Jesus, found their mouths filled with laughter and their tongues with singing like the gleeful Jews of the older times going home to the beloved city after their bondage in Babylon.

A veteran preacher said the other day in speaking of the long stretch of gloomy weather that had spoiled June for so many people: "When it's raining I ask the Lord to lift me higher—up above the clouds. It's sunshiny if we get high enough up." So there is always a place the soul can find where the joy bells shall begin ringing, where the soul shall make real music. And the happy heart lets the music flow from soul to lips, so that others, hearing, are led to sing.

What can be more beautiful than that—to make others sing? Composers of sacred songs must have many thrills of delight in hearing others sing the music they have dreamed. Even if we cannot create new songs we can sing the songs that others have made. As our heart receives fresh blessing, we sing the old songs, or the new songs, and other hearts catch the blessing too, and take up the melody. Heaven will be made sweeter if we shall hear music there that we helped to start upon earth.

Almost every one can sing. A country doctor whose life was a blessing to hundreds, although declaring that he could not sing a note, had a song of his own to a tune of his own almost constantly on his lips. It was Bless the Lord, O my soul.

Never mind whether the music you make is a kind the critics would praise. Take and keep the Saviour's joy, and, in some fashion or other, tell it out to others. Let your glad testimony be Singing I go along life's road,

For Jesus has lifted my load.

Looking Ahead

FROM his self-chosen exile in Spain, Max Nordau, the learned Jewish scientist, has written his impressions of the great war and his conclusions as to its effects. With the caution of a trained thinker, he puts aside as premature all predictions as to its duration. "One thing I do know," he writes, "and it is this: Whoever may conquer and whatever may be the conditions of peace, one result is certain—the utter destruction of Europe!"

These are ominous words. Professor Nordau has always been ranked as a pessimist; but even from such a source, the prediction cannot but be provocative of a feeling of dread lest it should come true. Let us glance at the basis of his gloomy forecast.

He estimates that of 28,000,000 men of all nationalities called into military service, 4,500,000 have been killed in battle or died of their wounds, or of diseases contracted in the war. Some 6,000,000 are permanently incapacitated from work by blindness, deafness, loss of limbs, or other injuries. Even if 16,000,000 returned from the war unhurt, almost all would come back with shattered nerves and the germs of disease in their bodies, which in the years to follow would add heavily to the mortality.

It must be admitted that the picture he draws of Europe after the war is a gloomy one. The events of the last two years have made the whole world sick of human slaughter. They have placed the stamp of irrevocable condemnation upon secret diplomacy and militarism.

One of the great lessons of the war should be that if the race is to live and progress, and if existence on this earth is to be made worth while, monarchs and cabinets should be subjected to rigid constitutional restraints, and compelled to respect the rights of their subjects and to live at peace with the rest of the world.

Those governments and peoples that have been engaged in the universal struggle must feel the conviction that the infliction of the world-war was permitted as a punishment to the nations for forgetting God. History shows conclusively that the land in which God's supreme sovereignty is no longer recognized, and where his laws are forgotten, is on the road to national obliteration. This fearful warning is being heeded, and there are increasing signs that men in all the combatant countries are turning back to God. They feel that only by obedience to the divine rulership can peace and a measure of happiness be restored to the world.

Does any one imagine that the men who survive this struggle, when they go back to their homes and see the signs of universal bereavement and suffering, will ever again welcome war? Will the aged men and the careworn women and the children, who have sat all these months under the shadow, desire to embitter their lives again? No; they will curse war in their hearts, and pray that God may heavily punish those who ever again plot war for their country, and lead the nations to forget that there is a greater Power than kings and cabinets, a Power whose will it is that all men should live in peace.

Putting the Old Life Behind

A WRITER relates the singular experience of an Alaskan tribe which, having undergone a transforming spiritual experience, decided to leave forever its ancient home settlement and seek a new location. Thirty-five years ago the tribe was wholly heathen, superstitious, practicing slavery, witchcraft, medicine, dancing, and living in a communal house, promiscuously huddled together. With the great change came the desire for a wholesome moral atmosphere, amid new surroundings, where they could lead their lives in freedom, relieved of the constant lure to return to the old ways of sin and unbelief. Now, with their separate homes, their pastor's house, chapel and school, they feel that they are really free to live as Christians and civilized beings should live. So it is with every soul when it rea ies the parting of the ways and decides for Christ. or-saking sin, it puts all the old life behind and resol ely presses forward in the new. The haunts of vice he evil companionships and associations, the scen of former degradations, no longer attract. Such a ne begins to realize the meaning of the words of ul. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature,' nd that the old things are indeed passed away fro his life, whether they pass by his own voluntary ac -in abandoning them as the Indians forsook their an nt home of heathenism and ignorance—or whether eir influence is destroyed by the new spiritual force at has been awakened in themselves.

The Joys of Childhood

ANOTHER summer's season of our Child n's Home has begun, and Mont-Lawn, with of its appointments fresh and inviting, is ice again a scene of unbounded delight for its hundr of little guests. We are planning this year to ente ain upward of twenty-five hundred children taken om homes of poverty, who have no other means of ge ng a much-needed fresh air outing. In this effort we pe to enjoy the kindly assistance of the readers o he Christian Herald and their friends, whose gene us-hearted help has made the Home so successful i he past. Every contributor we regard as a partn in this beautiful benevolence, to the developme of which Dr. Klopsch gave many of the best years his life. We all share his love of children, and it is ple ng to know that every little guest who comes to M at-Lawn learns quickly to realize that it really is a ace where, as its founder inscribed over the entrance te, one feels that he can truthfully say: "I love Go nd little children."

It would be a pleasure to greet as many o our friends as can pay a visit to Mont-Lawn this ar, that they may see for themselves how their tle beneficiaries are housed and cared for, and with hat zest they enter into all the enjoyments provide for them. Contributions for a number of cot endow its for the season are still needed. All gifts, large or s all, that are sent to the Christian Herald in aid o he work will be welcomed.

Conscientious Objectors

HAS a man, whose religious belief is that wa s a sin and the slaying of his fellow man a fo of murder, the right to act according t his conscientious convictions by refusing to use ms against his brother man? This is the question ich all England has been discussing. Thirty-four en called to compulsory military duty refused to ve. Being already in the army, they were subject t he jurisdiction of the military courts. They we ar-rested, summarily tried and sentenced to deat It is true, the sentences were afterward commut to life imprisonment; but this change was dou ess due to the force of public opinion, which, wh it condemned the attitude of the men, hesitated a he proposed infliction of the extreme penalty for fo w-ing the voice of conscience.

The "conscientious objector" represents to a numerous class. He bases his claim to imm ity from military service, in England at least, on a act of Parliament which, recognizing the right of a iti-zen to follow the voice of conscience, gives hi he privilege of claiming exemption on affording is-factory evidence of sincerity. But the state of p-ular opinion, inflamed by the war madness, has de life extremely difficult for the "conscientious ec-tor," who has been berated from all quarters, a by the church no less than others. There were fe p-parently who could grasp the thought that a an could genuinely hold his loyalty to Jesus Chris nd his teachings as more sacred and more oblig ry than any duty he owed to others. That the Chr ian religion and militarism are in absolute antag sm does not seem to have entered the minds o the preachers who, as a whole, were unsparing in eir denunciations of the men who had the ideals the Master so deeply at heart that they were willi to endure shame and obloquy and even death for em. We do not believe any one who is brave enou to face reproach, courts-martial and imprisonme at hard labor can be truthfully called a coward. C lid minds would rather admit that this is the st of which martyrs are made.

The Armor of Light

SUNDAY, July 16. Rom. 13 : 12. "Let us cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light." Here is a strange spectacle; the children of light wearing the armor of darkness! They are fighting the devil with the devil's weapons. Satan is seeking to cast out Satan. The soldiers of Jesus are harboring the very spirit they are out to fight! No wonder that their warfare has no conquests, and that they spend their strength in vain. The sharpest sword becomes a painted lath when our spirits are defiled. In these realms, a man's most fearful foes are they of his own household. The indwelling things of darkness infest and weaken all our powers.

A man can no more entertain sin and be virile than he can entertain a cancer and be healthy. Cancer sends its deadly trail throughout the entire currency of the blood; and indwelling sin deposits its deadly sediment on every power of mind and soul. Therefore, the first requisite of an efficient army is the mobilization of moral and spiritual resources. The most perilous of our weaknesses is an unclean spirit; the most vulnerable of all unpreparedness is that of the inner man.

The apostle bids us get rid of those deadly besetments. "Cast off the works of darkness!" He seems to speak of them as if they were a loathsome garment, as something that we are wearing which is more a hindrance than a help. But can we throw them away like a coat? Evil becomes a second nature. What was at first like a loose garment becomes at last like a skin. And we are not going to divest ourselves of the evil thing by an act of even fervent resolution. No man can accomplish it in his own strength, and it will be vain for him to try. The great apostle teaches that this form of divestiture is not an act of will, it is a work of grace. To strip us of the sin, which doth so closely cling to us, demands the infinite forces of salvation. The cross is still needful to remove my shame and stain.

But when the soul has been rid of its defilements, how bright and gleaming is its armor! The cleansed soul is shining in all the translucent purity of the children of God. It is "light in the Lord." It has armor for its own defense, for a character which is possessed and illumined by God's holy grace and love is gloriously immune. "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day." And it has armor for all its noble offenses; for what is so arresting as light, what so penetrating, so convincing, so overwhelming? "The light of Israel shall be for a fire." "Let us put on the armor of light." J. H. J.

The Soul in the Lamp

MONDAY, July 17. Zech. 4 : 1-14. "These are the two sons of oil (anointed ones) that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." If, in its primary significance, the figure indicated the royal and priestly elements of the Jewish national life, a comparison with Rev. 1:20 indicates that there is a further reference to the attitude of Christ toward his church, which is called to shine amid the darkness of the world. Hour after hour the oil climbs up the wick of the lamp to feed the flame, and thus, almost insensibly, the grace of the risen Saviour must pass through the medium of our faith into the radiant beauty of a life kindled by God.

Some among us appear to think that the soul can accumulate a stock of grace, in a sacrament, a convention, or a night of prayer. But this is at variance with the teaching of the wick. It accumulates nothing. It has no stores. From hour to hour, it is always on the edge of bankruptcy, but is always freely supplied. So should we live—at every moment giving all we have, but never doubting about the supplies of the future.

We may be but as wicks, with no pith or power of our own; smoking, charring, burning out; unnoticed amid the flame we yield; unrewarded and unthanked; pieces of coarse tow. But let us keep saturated in the fulness that is in Christ Jesus; let us abide in him; let us dip deep into the well of his supplies. So shall the quality of his glorious nature yield itself up through us for the illumination of men. Do not be surprised, however, if the divine hand, with delicate care, uses the golden snuffers to remove decay, and beware that nothing chokes the golden pipes of obedience and faith.

Heroes of the Spirit

TUESDAY, July 18. Isa. 42 : 1. "I have put my Spirit upon him; he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles." In these latter days in America, when the heroes of the sword and the captains of material industry are forced so vividly into our gaze, it is well to remember an old prophecy regarding the heroism of the Founder of our religion. According to Isaiah, he was to judge the Gentiles by reason of the possession of an unheard-of heroism—a heroism of the Spirit, whose victories exist in restraint of anger and temper, in peacemaking, in sustaining wrongs unavenged, in enduring defeats undismayed.

This new standard of strength, which was to make one worthy of rule and judgment over others, was foreign to the thought of the Gentiles, whose norm of greatness was the Roman sword. Is there not a danger that we here, in these more enlightened Christian days, may be led to forget this spiritual heroism, and the invisible but real victories of those regnant spirits who have learned to suffer and be strong according to the Gospel pattern?

It was said of a certain great general that he was so tenderhearted and gracious to those whom he conquered that he took away the sting of defeat. While we do not find in the Bible sufficient warrant to make us believers in "peace at any price," or to be seekers after the peace that is bought by the loss of protecting the weak, or discountenancing wrong wherever we find it, there is abundant proof that the Scriptures look forward to a day when the peacemakers shall inherit the earth, and when the spiritual heroes who, like the Lord of Life, have learned to forbear and forgive, will sit upon the thrones of judgment.

Let me remember that the ability to endure in patience, not to strive or cry, requires often the highest heroism. Ring in the age of the heroes of the Spirit! C. S. C.

Jesus, Saviour, Priest and King

WEDNESDAY, July 19. Zech. 6 : 1-15. "He shall build the temple of the Lord." The gold and silver sent from Babylon to the impoverished Jews of the Return was made into a crown that was placed on the miter of the high priest. The offices of priest and king, which in Israel were jealously kept apart, were thus symbolically combined. The counsel of peace came between them both. Of this the fulfilment is in Jesus. He is a Priest upon his throne. There is no doubt of the application of these words to him, as is established by the significant use of the term "the Branch." "There shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit, and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him." Slightly altering the words of Zacharias, the whole of the New Testament seems to say, "The Branch from on high hath visited us." Through a branch the fulness of the root is carried to the fruit, which swells in ruddy beauty on its extremity and presently falls into the hand of the wayfarer. So Jesus is the blessed channel of communication between God's fulness and the thirst of the human soul. We sit under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit is sweet to our taste.

As Priest, Jesus pleads the merit of his blood; as King, he exerts power on our behalf. As Priest, he pacifies the guilty conscience; as King, he wields the scepter over our hearts. As Priest, he brings us nigh unto God; as King, he treads our enemies beneath his feet. It is of great importance to think of him in this dual aspect. On the one hand we obtain the benefit of his cross and passion; on the other, the benefit of his resurrection and ascension to the right hand of God. May it not account for the weakness of our Christian life, that we have not seen him, as John did—"a lamb in the midst of the throne"? F. B. M.

Where to Make Our Decisions

THURSDAY, July 20. Gal. 1 : 17. "Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them that were apostles before me: but I went away into Arabia; and again I returned unto Damascus." I recall attending a conference where young men were being advised by an old and godly returned missionary concerning making decisions for or against the field of foreign missions. He said: "Make your decisions on the mountain of your clearest spiritual vision. That is the surest way to know that you are following the call of God. You can never expect to see your duty vividly, or have the power to decide upon it, when you are surrounded with all the conflicting voices of the world. Decisions like this are calls from God, and not from men."

Such was evidently Paul's view, as he left even the circle of apostles to go off into the wastes of Arabia to make his decisions in the presence of God alone. In another place he says, "Sin revived, and I died."

One needs pure air to breathe if he is to enrich his spiritual vitality. There are some things that neither flesh nor blood can reveal to us, things that grow bright only in the presence of God himself.

"It is from the gates of the divine temple that I behold the storm. It is from the shelter of the ark that I discern the waters of the flood. Only he who has heard the still small voice can detect the thunder, the earthquake and the fire."

My highest moments mark the hours for my best decisions. C. S. C.

Jesus the Emancipator

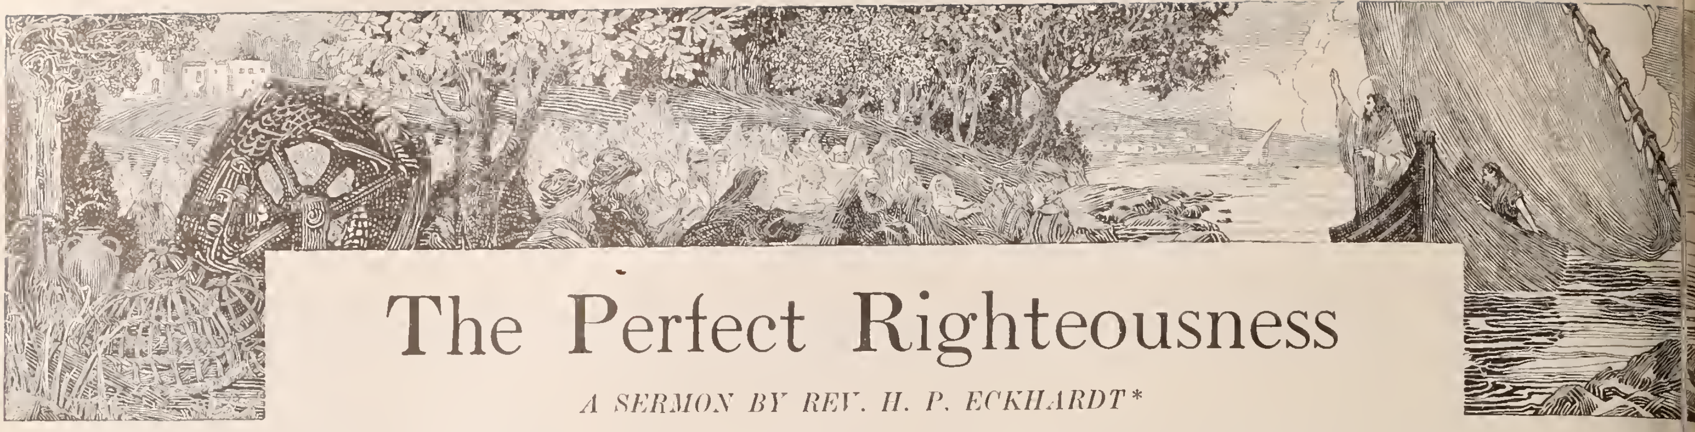
FRIDAY, July 21. Zech. 9 : 9-17. "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee." This stream of exalted prediction, sweet as the refrain of an angel's hymn, was fulfilled when, in lowly triumph, Jesus entered Jerusalem at the beginning of the week in which he died. See Matt. 21 : 5. What contrasts meet in the prophet's words! Jesus is King—first King and then Saviour. The King who saves is lowly, his steed is not the richly caparisoned war-horse, but the humble ass. Unlike earthly monarchs, he needs neither chariot nor battle-bow for the overthrow of his foes, but speaks peace to the nations; as though waving his hands in priestly benediction over the troubled waters, and lo, there is a great calm. If we would be truly saved by Jesus, he must be the enthroned King of our hearts, and enter in lowly triumph over our wills.

When this has taken place, the prisoners are emancipated from their prisons. In Eastern lands, liable to long spells of drought, it is customary to hew cisterns out of the solid rock for water-storage. When these were empty they provided useful retreats or hiding-places. The terrified peasantry would shelter there when the enemy was scouring the country. Are there not many of God's people in a similar plight? They are caught in the snares and toils of malignant foes, or led captive by the devil at his will, or are in deep despondency, or are imprisoned by adverse circumstances. Yet they are prisoners of hope. There is a sure and certain hope of their deliverance. They shall ultimately emerge from their prisons, as Peter did, led by the angel. God has entered into covenant relationship with them. And because of the blood of the everlasting covenant he will remember them and emancipate them from their thraldom. Wherever they are, and however thick-ribbed the walls of their prison, their Saviour-King will come to their rescue. God declares that today he will render double all his past love. F. B. M.

Look Upward, Not Downward

SATURDAY, July 22. II Cor. 10 : 12. "But they, comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise." John B. Gough once told how he found the Lord. He was a poor, drunken wretch, walking the streets of New York City, almost starving. He soliloquized thus: "Why has the Lord left me cold and hungry? I have only been tempted and fallen like many other people; why does not God take care of me?" Then the thought flashed upon him, "You may be as good as many other persons, but you are not as good as God or Christ." Then he said to himself, "I ought to be hungry; I am a miserable sinner. I deserve to die." Then and there he resolved to become like Christ and nevermore compare himself with others. The next policeman he met, he asked him where he could get some crusts of bread, and he handed him a roll from his pocket.

During Gough's wonderful career as an orator and reformer, he ever refrained from comparing himself with other fallen men, but ever compared himself with the life of Christ. Our ideal should be nothing less than the divine Saviour. We should never be satisfied till we are in his likeness, ever asking ourselves the question, "What would Jesus do?" We should ever follow him, not our stumbling, falling human brothers, saying, "I am as good as many church members," in order to quiet a troubled conscience. Such excuses will not avail in the final appraisement of soul-valuation. E. W. C.



The Perfect Righteousness

*A SERMON BY REV. H. P. ECKHARDT

TEXT Matt. 5:20. "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

THESE words of our Saviour set forth two great fundamental and distinctive truths, which lead us into the very heart of the Christian religion. 1. The Righteousness required by Christ as the condition of our entrance into the kingdom of heaven. 2. The manner in which this righteousness may be acquired.

A STRANGE doctrine this must have been to those who looked upon the scribes and Pharisees as foremost in religion. The scribes were the most noted teachers of the law, the Pharisees the most noted professors of it. It had been said among the Jews, if but two people were to enter heaven, one would be a Pharisee, the other a scribe. Such was the righteousness of their outward life that the common people did not think themselves obliged to be as good as they; in fact, they thought it almost beyond their reach to attain to the height of the Pharisees' holiness.

What a surprise, then, to hear from the lips of the great Prophet of Nazareth that "except your righteousness shall exceed"—go beyond, be better than—"the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Wherein did the righteousness of the Pharisees and the scribes fall short? What was lacking? It did not go far enough. They were extremely careful to observe some of the laws or parts of the law, while they fell short in others. And it did not go deep enough. That was the chief lack. It did not penetrate beneath the shell of the outward life. They endeavored to keep clean the outside of the cup and neglected the inside.

But the law of God, properly understood, reaches deep into the heart with all its desires, motives, and thoughts. The law of God demands holiness in the inner sanctuary as well as in the outer courts. To drive this home the Saviour adduces, by way of illustration, several commandments of the decalogue. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill." "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery" (verses 21, 27). The traditional interpretation of the self-righteous scribes and Pharisees confined the application of these commands to the actual crime of murder and adultery. Our Lord shows that it extends deeper—into the heart. "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment." "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." "Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." Therefore in the sight of Him who searches the inner fountain of life, the evil thought, the wicked wish, and the unclean desire are as guilty as the deeds.

And so the only righteousness that can please God is the one that exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees; that conforms to the law not merely in outward deed and action, but also in the inner recesses of the heart with its desires, motives, and thoughts. And this conformity to the law must be complete, without any violation whatsoever. Accordingly the Lord closes this section of his sermon on the Mount with the words recorded at the end of this chaper: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Perfection, a hundred per cent. holiness, is the only righteousness that can please the Lord.

ARE you astonished at this statement? It is the clearly expressed requirement of the divine law, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Can God be satisfied with less? Can it be possible to please the holy God with an imperfect, spotted righteousness? Can it be a matter of indifference to God whether we live up to the standard of holiness or whether we sin against his laws? Righteousness is rightness. Let us not forget that. To be righteous we must be right. An imperfect rightness is a contradiction. Even a just judge of this world cannot pronounce an accused one right and righteous if he finds him guilty of so little as one violation of the law. And so the great and holy God cannot be satisfied with less than a perfect righteousness.

But is this doctrine not sufficient to drive a man to despair? For where on this terrestrial globe is the man who has ever succeeded in working out for himself and of himself a perfect rightness? "There is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not" (Eccl. 7:20), says the Preacher inspired by the Omniscient Spirit of God. "We are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags" (Isa. 64:6). If God's message to humanity were confined to the law, with its stern demands of a perfect rightness as the condition of our entrance into the kingdom of heaven, man indeed would be driven to despair. No one might hope to stand before the Omniscient One and receive the reward of eternal life by virtue of his own self-made, filthy-rag righteousness. The sinner must wander to his grave condemned—lost.

"SHUT IN"

SHUT IN, shut in from the ceaseless din
Of the restless world, and its want and sin:
Shut in from its turmoil, care and strife,
And all the wearisome round of life.

Shut in with tears that are spent in vain,
With the dull companionship of pain;
Shut in with the changeless days and hours,
And the bitter knowledge of failing powers.

Shut in with dreams of the days gone by,
With buried joys that were born to die;
Shut in with hopes that have lost their zest,
And leave but a longing after rest.

Shut in with a trio of angels sweet:
Patience and Grace all pain to meet,
With Faith that can suffer and stand and wait,
And lean on the promises, strong and great.

Shut in with Christ! Oh, wonderful thought!
Shut in with the peace his sufferings brought;
Shut in with the love that wields the rod;
Oh, company blest! Shut in with God.

MRS. J. M. DANA.

But, thank God, we have from the lips of Jesus, the prophets, and the apostles also the sweet Gospel message, which proclaims to unrighteous, condemned, lost mankind the joyful tidings. "Unto you is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." And so what man could not do the Saviour, which is Christ the Lord, did. "Think not," says he, "that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil." The Saviour here assures us that the purpose of his coming was to fulfil the law—that is, fill it full. The law with all its demands and penalties may be considered as a vessel. Man had been trying to fill it full by his own efforts, but unsuccessfully. All have come far short of the mark. Hence we are all under the condemnation of God and his broken law—lost. But behold! "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which is lost." And how did he save them? "I am come . . . to fulfil" the law. He came, and with his atoning life and death filled it full to the brim; full, so that not one word of the law remained unfilled, and not one penalty unsatisfied. He worked out a perfect righteousness.

And this he did not for himself. He did it for us. What saith the prophet? "In his"—the Messiah's—"days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: the Lord our Righteousness" (Jer. 23:6). This righteousness he offers us without money and without price.

THE prodigal son, reduced to extremity, hungry, in filthy rags, finally comes to himself. He realized his lost condition. Repentant, he turns his face homeward to his father, whence his help shall come. And home he goes, unworthy though he may be. Home he goes in all his filthy rags, hoping and trusting that his father will have mercy upon him and take him in and supply what is lacking. And when he is yet a great way off, his father sees him and has compassion on him. Yet the naked, filthy, ragged condition of his son cannot please the father. In such condition the son cannot enter and dwell in his home. What does the father do? Send him away to make himself look right? That is just what the pro al could not do. And that is just what the father nself did. He said unto his servants, "Bring forth he best robe and put it on him; and put a ring o is hand, and shoes on his feet."

And that is what the heavenly Father does us in our lost condition. Jesus himself has worke ut and offers us the perfect garment of his sp ss righteousness, with which alone we may a ar before the countenance of the Most High and ell in his kingdom.

Jesus, Thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress,
Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.

O poor, blind souls that are sleeping secure in the thought that a spotted and ragged right isness will satisfy the holy God, and will at the nd secure admission into the kingdom of heaven Is that not the delusion of multitudes of people ay in the very precincts of the Christian Ch h? Brother, you must go to the Saviour and accep he robe of his righteousness which he offers to save u. And how do we accept it? By stretching forth he hand of faith; by trusting in him. There is a rer kable word written of Abraham in the fifteenth ch ter of Genesis. God had promised Abraham, in hi ld age, that his seed should be as numerous as the rs in the heaven, and that from this seed the Me h, the Saviour, should come. "Abraham believe in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousn s." Abraham believed—in the original amened—i he Lord. Abraham amened the Lord, that is, he id, "Even so, Lord, Thou hast promised me this at Seed, the Saviour. Amen; so be it, Lord. Thou st promised that this Seed shall be the righteousnes nd salvation of thy people. Amen; so be it with me, L l."

And what was the result? The Lord counted to him for righteousness. Let us do likewise. So it, Lord. Thou art my Saviour and thou art my hteousness. Amen.

BUT remember that you must come to him ust as you are, without any thoughts of self-hteousness. Mr. Moody tells the story of an artist ho wanted a man for a model who would represen he Prodigal. One day he met a wretched beggar, a he thought: "That man would represent the Prod l." He found the beggar willing to sit for his painti , if he would pay him. The man appeared on th ay appointed, but the artist did not recognize him

"You made an appointment with me," said the an.

"No," responded the artist, "I never saw ou before."

"You are mistaken; you did see me, and ma an appointment with me."

"No; it must have been some other artist. , I ve an appointment to meet a beggar here at this h r."

"Well," said the beggar, "I am the man."

"You the man?"

"Yes."

"What have you been doing?"

"Well, I thought I would get a new suit of cl hes before I got painted."

"Oh," replied the artist, "I don't want you."

And so, if you are coming to God, come ju as you are. Do not go and put on some garmer of your own. All your "put on" righteousness wi hot avail. Come just as you are. Come with all our crimes. Come with all your broken vows. me with your hardened heart. Come with your los pportunities. Come with your crushing burden. me —come just as you are.

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bidst me come to thee,
O Lamb of God, I come, I come!

He will receive, pardon, cleanse, relieve. H vill give thee the perfect robe of his blood and right usness. So shalt thou be acceptable to our Father nd shalt enter the kingdom, saved by the grace of od and the spotless righteousness of Jesus Christ. nd thus cleansed and saved, he sends you out int he world to serve him in everlasting righteou ss, innocence, and blessedness. He sends you o a cleansed vessel, to be of service to him and huma ty.

A Weed Garden

MANY gardens that are planted to vegetables and fruits are little more than weed patches, as those having the matter in harge may be indolent, incompetent or oo busy with other things to look af them. But W. L. Oswald has pl ted 175 varieties of weeds in a half-ac piece of ground at St. Paul, Minn., a puts in his time cultivating them. He is t crazy, he is not a crank, he is assistant professor of b ny at the University of M nesota College of Agric ure, and is experimenting w the weeds to find their n ure and habits and the best m hods of exterminating them fo he benefit of the practical fa er of the state. The profe r is the head of the seedte ing laboratory of the state. T weed garden is as carefu laid out and cultivated as the best gardens raising d ias, nasturtiums, and pansi and is the largest of the ki in the United States. T perennials have one part of the space, the biennials h e another, and the annuals a ther part all their own. E h little variety has a bed in w h no other weeds are allo d to grow. Wherever t e is life there is some enemy t pester, eat or destroy it. T stalk of corn or stem of w at will never grow up and yi d the grain if the weeds c prevent it, and the hoe a plow are called into const t requisition to prevent t destruction of the crops. T same law obtains in the sp itual realm. No seed of t h or virtue peeps above the g und but some weed of error o vil appears also to crowd it o and starve it to death by t ing the nourishment meant f it. The ground has strength e ugh to raise a crop of w at or weeds, but not st ngth enough for both. The s of the soul has strength e ugh to raise a harvest of ri teousness and love, or one o moral evil, but not for b h. Christ thus refers to the s thering, robbing, destructi process of unfriendly g wths upon the harvest of g in in spiritual agriculture: “ nd some fell among thorns; a the thorns sprang up, and c ked them.” (Matt. 13 : 7.)

Built Church, Blocks Saloon

THE new one-story church at Prince's Bay, Staten Island, was built in a day. It was erected Saturday, May 27, and men and women of the little community are congratulating themselves on a strategic victory over rum. For twenty years efforts have been made to build a saloon in the old village. Steadily the citizens have resisted invasion. But recently an Italian liquor magnate came to town and purchased some land at two angles of a Prince's Bay square. When it became known that the enemy had at last entrenched among them, the inhabitants were dismayed There is a state law which prohibits a saloon from being built within two hundred feet of any church. Friday night the women of the village held a mass meeting. General indignation prompted quick action. Subscriptions were taken. W. A. Johnson, who owned one of the corners in the square, gave the land. Miss Isabella Thorne, a school teacher, hurriedly improvised architectural plans. Next morning Alderman Charles P. Cole was on the spot superintending a squad of men and women. When the sun set Saturday night its last rays shone on the windows of the magic church. Sunday afternoon the Rev. F. W. Sloat, a Methodist minister, dedicated the new frame "annex" of the Prince's Bay Union Church. The prayer meeting that day was unusually fervid. The church and saloon represent such opposite and essentially antagonistic ideas that the laws of most of the states separate them by the space of from 100 feet to five miles. One of the nineteen prohibition states was made so by accommodating a law a generation old, applying to rural districts, to all parts of the state, forbidding a saloon closer than four miles to a church or school. One of Judge Charles E. Hughes's most important acts as governor of New York was to veto the bill passed by the legislature allowing a bar in the Gotham Hotel opposite the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City, holding that the law was wise in keeping such institutions separated. The good people on Staten Island, in building the church and keeping out the saloon, obeyed this apostolic injunction: "Abhor that which is evil: cleave to that which is good" (Rom. 12 : 9.)

C tacombs of 7th Ave.

I digging the Seventh Avenue subway in New York, F. P. Volckmann, a stant engineer of the Seventh Div on, reported to the Public Service C mmission the find of “The Catac bs of Seventh Avenue.” The digg s ran into a graveyard and into vaults u ler the site of the old Bedford Metho st Church and the little cemetery a und it into which had been laid the l lies of hundreds if not thousands of p ple. When the cemetery was aband ned as a public burying ground these s terranean tombs were carefully s led up, and the workers with pick a l shovel found some bones, and now a l then a silver coffin plate with the n me and the date of birth and death. W hat do the living care for the dead? T ey cherish the grass of the present g eration, or maybe the one before, l after that scant attention is paid t the bodies of the dead except to get t m out of the way to make room for the business of the living. The business of a city moves toward the public burying ground; it will not pass around it, but it goes over it, takes the marble slabs down and carts the bones off to a new place farther out of town. It says, “Why, this ground is worth $100 a front foot. We cannot afford to let these old fellows occupy it now when they are not doing a lick of work or making a cent of money.” Age of utility this, to bore through the tombs of the dead and send a subway express through the Catacombs of Seventh Avenue at the rate of thirty miles an hour. Living duty as compared with the burial of the dead is thus mentioned: “Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead.” (Matt. 8: 22.)

Tattoo Marks to Stay

A COSMOPOLITAN daily newspaper in answering questions on various subjects has an answer to one asking how to remove tattoo marks. It says: “If there are ways and means of removing these marks we know nothing about them. Somebody might know. In all probability the marks, once well put in, are there for good.” How many silly people have one device or another pricked with a needle in India ink in the arm or breast, not realizing that it can never be gotten out, and have carried the defacement with sorrow till the day of their death. These indelible devices are types of the evil devices the needle of sin pricks into the substance of the soul. And though Christ may entirely forgive the sins and redeem the character, so often the scars of wrongdoing endure; the needle of habit has pricked into the heart the brilliantly colored devices which cannot be gotten out. The habit that pricks the skin with ink that cannot be removed if left unchecked will become a deadly instrument to destroy the soul. “And put a knife to thy throat if thou be a man of appetite.” (Prov. 23 : 2.)

Catholic Ban on Dancing

SCARCELY anything in a generation has caused such a sensation in Catholic social circles as the ban put on dancing by authority from Rome. In 1885 dancing was forbidden and the churches were instructed not to allow any dances whatever under their auspices even if the money from them were donated to church purposes. The law fell into disuse, and the dances given all over the nation were under the permission and for the financial benefit of the churches. The modern dances became so dangerous and demoralizing that the papal authority renewed the decree of the Council of Baltimore, and Cardinals O'Connell of Boston, Farley of New York, and Gibbons of Baltimore sent the papal decree and a letter of their own to the priests, and through them to every Catholic church in America, forbidding any dance under church auspices not only, but also attendance of the priests at any of them held by the laymen. The church will lose in money, but will gain immensely in the purity of the life of the young people and in elevating the standard of social morals. Catholics and Protestant churches, Hebrews, Young Men's Christian Associations, Young Women's Christian Associations, and good people everywhere should speak out loudly and unequivocally against the grosser and positively immoral forms of the public modern dance if the next generation is to preserve the virtue which is its heritage and privilege. Persons who do not object to parlor dances admit the appalling danger of the public modern dance. The ban of the church on the modern dance is in harmony with this prayer of our Lord: “Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.” (Matt. 6 : 13.)

Dies of Bee Stings

GEORGE SHAMBAUGH, of Blaine, Pa., was handling a hive of bees the other day when they turned upon him and stung him to death. Science has greatly reduced the dangers of bee culture, which has gotten to be a great industry in this country. Methods of action and devices of protection have made dealing with bees a pleasure rather than a fear to many specialists. The bee that lives among the flowers, and sips the nectar, and manufactures for man one of the most exquisite luxuries for his table, has also the sting and sack of poison. Everywhere in nature there are the suggestions of pleasure and pain, of good and evil, of life and death. The untimely death here recorded illustrates the frailty of this earthly life thus expressed by Job in one of his pessimistic moods: “As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.” (Job 7 : 9.)

Foolish Affection

DR. WOODS HUTCHINSON, in an article in the New York American on “City Dog a Menace to Health,” says, among other things: “It is disgusting to see women kissing and slobbering over the dirty, hairy, gutter-loving little beasts in public and entreating them to ‘come to muzzer:’ ‘Was it a naughty boy?’ It has been proposed by chancellors of the exchequer of some nations that every woman keeping a pet dog, particularly one with silk blankets, jeweled collars, embroidered handkerchiefs and fur boots and a maid and valet to wait on it, ought to be taxed double what the little beast costs her for the benefit of mother pensions, and the education of orphans.” Women who have no children, or whose children are grown up and gone, often find company and comfort in a dog, but it should not monopolize the affection when there are so many poor women and children to help. The Jew had an unjustly poor opinion of a dog. “Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?” (I Sam. 17: 43.)

A Few Facts Regarding Mexico

A FRONTIER is a stretch of country lying on the near side of an imaginary but very definitely located line which we call the National boundary. National honor is very much concerned with this frontier, and to cross it without authority is to challenge all the red blood of the people to whom the frontier belongs. The Mexican frontier of the United States follows the Rio Grande from its mouth at Brownsville, Texas, for 1,136 miles, to the point where Mexico, Texas and New Mexico impinge upon each other. From there the frontier runs in a more or less westerly direction to the Pacific Ocean, the total length from the Gulf to the Pacific being 1,833 miles.

The Texas country along the Rio Grande is a rolling plain with an occasional plateau or butte or ridge of rocks, the whole being covered by an undergrowth of mesquite and scrub oak with semi-tropical vegetation, except where the occasional settler has forced the rich but reluctant soil to assume some of the attributes of civilization. It is a raw country, suitable for pasturing cattle, whose trails run like a mystic maze through the mesquite, a country well adapted to banditry. It is a lonesome country. The ranches are far apart, and except around Brownsville and Harlingen and north along the coast to Corpus Christi it is sparsely inhabited, and the ranch houses and settlements are far apart. On the Mexican side of the river at varying distances up to eight miles the river is bordered by the foothills of the Sierra Madre coast range and the first terraces of the great central plateau of Mexico.

At Brownsville, Laredo, Eagle Pass, and El Paso international bridges lead to the Mexican cities of Matamoros, Nuevo Laredo, Ciudad Porfirio Diaz, and Juarez. In normal times these bridges carry a considerable commerce in goods and persons. When Mexico had a stable government, many Americans entered into commercial ventures on Mexican soil, and a considerable portion of the population of the border cities was American, while a considerable portion of the border cities on the American side was Mexican, the Mexicans, however, being largely laborers. At the time of the census of 1910 there were in the whole United States 706,329 Spanish-speaking people, of whom 221,915 were born in Mexico. Probably 125,000 of these were residents of the state of Texas.

During the five years of revolution and disorder in Mexico the Mexican population on the American side of the border has largely increased by the influx of refugees, and according to a recent proclamation, addressed by the governor of Texas to Mexicans resident within the state, there must be now about 150,000 Mexicans on the American side of the Rio Grande within a short distance of their native soil. Just how much of an element of danger this population might be no one can tell. They have their sympathies, of course, but many of them are not with General Carranza. We may be certain, however, that the military authorities are taking proper precautions against any unrest among our Mexican population.

In normal times an international bridge was guarded at each end by a customs guard, usually a corporal's guard of eight men, whose business it was to see that none crossed without payment of the proper toll or without proper papers authorizing them to enter or to leave the country. Since northern Mexico has been torn with revolution heavy American forces have been maintained at the northern end of all international bridges, and most of the time there has been a corresponding Mexican guard at the other end.

In peace times the normal imports of Mexico were $97,886,169, of which $63,356,898 were handled at the important ports of Vera Cruz and Tampico. The normal exports were $150,202,808, of which $82,497,685 were handled at Vera Cruz and Tampico. No data are available as to the proportion of this commerce that must have crossed the border, but it is probable that more than half the remaining $34,000,000 of imports and $68,000,000 of exports went this way.

El Paso is the largest American city on the Mexican boundary. Juarez, opposite, is the largest Mexican town facing an American city across the line. El Paso is a modern city of about 25,000 population. It has electric lights, electric cars, paved streets, and all of the earmarks of American civilization. The street-car line operates across the international bridge into Juarez, which has an imposing business section, an old cathedral, imposing municipal buildings, and the usual collection of huts of Mexican laborers, which contrast strangely with the comfortable homes of the educated merchant class, whom the peons stigmatize as "Cientificos."

In normal times the United States has maintained troops at various points along the border, the principal troops being maintained at Fort Sam Houston near San Antonio, Texas, which is the headquarters of the Southern Department, and at Fort Bliss near El Paso. Troops are maintained at Fort Travis, San Juan, Fort San Jacinto, San Benito, Mission, Mercedes, Fort Mackintosh, Lyford, Laredo, Harlingen, Del Rio, Fort Crockett, Eagle Pass, Fort Clark, Brownsville, all in Texas, and at Apache, Arizona; Calexico, California; Fort Huachuca, Arizona; Nogales, Arizona; San Diego, California, and Yuma, Arizona. All of these troops were within call of the border. But since the Mexican uprising became more or less continuous a large part of the Federal army has been engaged in attempting to protect the many miles of border.

Because of the great distances, however, there is much territory between camps to be protected, and this protection has been afforded in three ways. In the neighborhood of the camps, outposts have been maintained something in the nature of a system of sentries, a man or a couple of men being on the watch constantly day and night. Between camps, cavalry patrols have ridden up and down along the winding trails, or across the desert spaces, fully armed and ready for any eventuality, the size of the patrols depending upon the possible danger of hostile clashes, varying thus from four or eight or sixteen men to a whole company, or, in case they were expecting to head off some band already discovered by scouts or outposts, the patrol might even consist of an entire battalion of three or four troops. In addition to these patrols of cavalry, scouts riding singly, either cavalrymen detached from their commands or cowboys in the national service as scouts, made many lonesome and dangerous rides along the courses of the river. And in addition to all these, there are motorcycle scouts and patrols.

In addition to the towns a mentioned, there is opposite Pr Texas, Ojinaga; opposite Douglas the town of Agua Prieta; opposite Arizona, the town of San José; the towns of Nogales in Arizon Calexico in California straddle th the main streets of the towns foll the boundary; north of the bou the towns are under American g ment, and south of the line th Mexican. At Nogales, Ari., the can line of the Southern Pacific Ra crosses into Mexico.

The republic of Mexico is ma of thirty-one states and terri the population at the last censu 15,063,000. The national debt i was $226,404,000, on which the i charges were $13,761,000. Farms of the Yukon

By FRANK G. CARPENTE

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpent

Some of the proud plants in the $10,000 potato patch

THIS is the story of Chicken Billy and his Ten Thousand Dollar Potato Patch. It is the story of a young American who became the poultry king of the Klondike, and then went into farming with such success that he has one field of potatoes that will bring in $10,000 this fall. That is a sample of what farming can do on the banks of the Yukon, and a suggestion of the fertility of Alaska as well.

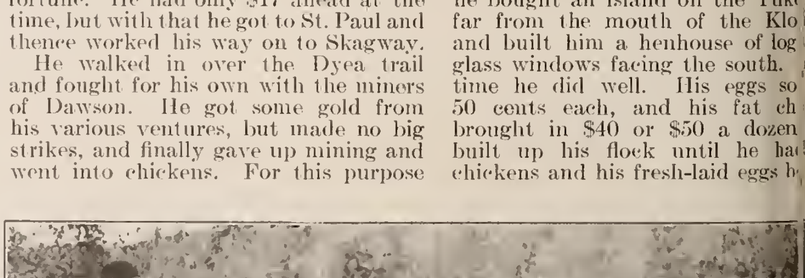
Chicken Billy is a good type of the farmers of the Far North. A rough-looking young man of less than medium height, his face is bronzed from the hot summer sun of the arctic and his hands are horny with handling the plow. He introduced himself to me as William Anstett, nicknamed Chicken Billy, and asked me to go with him up the river to look at his farms. I accepted the invitation and have just returned from the trip, the most interesting I have yet had on the Yukon.

Anstett is an American, a bachelor, only thirty-seven years old, and good to his mother. I know this, for the old lady, although she is over fourscore, is now on her way from Seattle to the Klondike. She likes the cold weather, and prefers to spend her winters in Billy's cabin rather than with her well-to-do son in the States.

Billy was born in Philadelphia, and went to school there. He was still under twenty when he passed the examinations for appointment to the navy at the time of the Cuban War. He was so excited over his success that when he came into the hands of the surgeons to be tested as to his physical fitness his heart was throbbing at the rate of a hundred and odd beats to the minute, and the result was that the doctors pronounced him unfit for the service. They said he had heart disease.

Billy then worked at odd jobs, without great success, until one day he saw a paper describing the strike in the Klondike. The article was headed "Gold at the Grass Roots," and Billy tells me he decided to get into the grass and dig out a fortune. He had only $17 ahead at the time, but with that he got to St. Paul and thence worked his way on to Skagway.

He walked in over the Dyea trail and fought for his own with the miners of Dawson. He got some gold from his various ventures, but made no big strikes, and finally gave up mining and went into chickens. For this purpose he bought an island on the Yuk far from the mouth of the Klo and built him a henhouse of log glass windows facing the south. time he did well. His eggs so 50 cents each, and his fat ch brought in $40 or $50 a dozen built up his flock until he ha chickens and his fresh-laid eggs b



And a few of the pigs with their proud owner, Chicken Billy so ell known that he acquired his nic ame, Chicken Billy, which he hol to this day throughout the whole reg n. He thought he was on the fair roa to fortune, when competition came in. The other poultry raisers cut prices anc hickens dropped to a dollar apiece. Bil found that his hens did not do so wel n large flocks. He was losing mon- ey d looked about for other kinds of far ng instead. He is now raising onl fancy chickens and is devoting his nergy to hogs and potatoes, with cro of turnips and oats now and then on e side.

I ent to see Billy's farms in com- par with him and Dr. G. M. Faulkner, the acting United States consul at Da on. Dr. Faulkner has a dairy far of 200 acres on the opposite side of e river from where the Klondike flow in. He has Jerseys and Holsteins and supplies most of the milk and cre for Dawson, charging $1.50 a gall for his milk and selling cream at a quart.

L ving Dawson, we started up the Yu n in a gasoline boat about three feet n width and forty feet long. The boa had a big paddle-wheel at the end and his was attached by a long iron sha to the engine. We had gone only two miles up the river when the shaft bro and we had to row ourselves to the earest island and walk. We left the each and made our way through the otato rows from one little patch to other. The first farm we visited was wned by a Swede named Nelson. He s eleven acres under cultivation, one alf in potatoes and the other half in s. The oats are grown for hay and are now being cut. Some of it stoc in shocks as high as my head. The emainder was uncut and the grain reac d half way to my waist. As we oked I asked Billy the price the oats ay would bring. His reply was: "Si y dollars a ton."

A we left Mr. Nelson, it was after 9 'cl k in the evening, but the sun was still igh in the heavens and I was able o t e a snapshot of him standing in ron of his cabin.

W found ourselves at the end of the sla , but there was another island up- stre about a half mile away. Billy put is hands around his mouth and sho ed, whereupon a man came out of t bushes of the second island and wav his hands at us. It was Billy's arm r. He was told to bring a canoe and arry us over the water from one plac to another. As soon as we landed Bill ordered him to start getting sup- per d to have the meal ready by the tim ve had taken a look at the stock and e farm.

IN he meantime, Chicken Billy, Dr. ulkner and I took a look at the hot use, where cucumbers and to- mat s are raised for the markets of Daw on. This is one of the most in- tere ng features of farming in the Far Nor . There are more than twenty- five g hothouses in Dawson itself, and they re all doing well, although Billy says is farm makes more than any two of t others. Up to July of this year, he has ld over 900 cucumbers, and by the d of the season he will have sold twic that many more. His first cuc bers brought him more than $4 a do n, they next dropped to $3.50 a doze and on the average the crop of the ear will net about 20 cents for each nd every cucumber sold. If his figu are right, his cucumber re- ceip from the hothouse this year will o r $500. He picked 111 this week, and he vines are still loaded.

T prices of tomatoes are equally high and he has a good crop under glas

T s hothouse is about thirty feet wide nd fifty feet long. It consists of a grea pit walled with logs to the sur- e f the ground and above that a fra work covered with glass, forming glas walls and a glass roof. The house s ke t warm by wood fires, a hundred- gall gasoline tank having been made nto stove for the purpose. The plants re t out in beds upon low tables wi are connected with a network of ire The vines of the cucumbers and tom es are trained on the wires. The run up the walls and hang down ron he roof. Many of the cucumbers are er ten inches in length and the largest tomatoes are bigger than the heads of some babies.

Leaving the hothouses, we took a look at the hogs. During the summer they are kept in inclosures out in the open, although they have sleeping pens or covered platforms on which they crawl at night. In the winter they live in the log henneries, which have been turned into pig pens. The buildings are warmed with good stoves, and the fires have to be on day and night. There are thirteen log buildings on the farm and most of them are devoted to pigs.

Chicken Billy started into the hog business with fourteen suckling pigs, the most of which had taken prizes at the agricultural fair at Vancouver. He gets from $15 to $25 for each pig when it is six weeks of age—that is, ready for weaning. He sold 100 last year.

I went with Billy from pen to pen to examine the stock. It is said that a man may be known by the way animals act in his presence. If they like him he is to be trusted, if not he is a good man to watch. His hogs seem to love him. He talks to them as though they were human. He speaks and they will lie down and turn over just like pet dogs. One of his biggest boars does tricks.

During the winter the pigs are fed upon potatoes and grain. The food is cooked and served red-hot morning and evening. In taking care of his animals Billy saves every bit of manure. The soil of the Yukon needs fertilizing and this by-product is worth about $37 per hog per annum Such fertilizer in the United States Billy says is worth not more than $12.

AFTER dinner we took a skiff and sailed from the island to Billy's potato farm on the mainland. This farm is right on the banks of the Yukon, and the ten-thousand-dollar crop is within a stone's throw of the river. The field is a half mile in length and of such a width that it makes altogether seventeen acres.

The farmhouse stands in the center of it. It is a log cabin with a great cellar under it where the potatoes are stored until ready for market. The thermometer here falls at times during the winter to seventy degrees below zero, but the cellar is so made that the potatoes do not freeze. The walls are furred out and made double. The board floors under the tubers are ventilated and there is a dead air space where there is any danger of frost. The potatoes are kept in large bins, each holding hundreds of bushels. I found some of last year's crop still in the bin. They are as solid and sweet as when they came from the fields. Indeed, it is hard to tell them from the new potatoes.

I have seen many farms, but none better cultivated and freer of weeds than this potato patch. The vines reach to my knees. They are in rows which are perfectly straight, and the plow goes just one mile in the round trip up one row and back down another. Billy tells me he hopes to have six or seven tons to the acre and that the patch should yield about 100 tons, or over 3,000 bushels. He expects to get $100 per ton, so that the gross receipts should be something like $10,000.

The soil is a sandy loam made up of silt brought down by the Yukon. The virgin land is covered with bushes and trees so thick that it takes $100 and upward an acre to clear it. Farm wages are high. In ordinary seasons a hand gets as much as $100 a month and board, and just now Billy is paying his tenants $75 a month and their board. I would say, however, that the demand for labor is limited, and the market for potatoes and other vegetables is confined to the small population in the mines and in Dawson. Much competition would take the heart out of the business, and if the farms were increased by many new homesteaders there would be a glut in the market and the prices would fall.

Luther Burbank, the man who originated the Burbank potato and who has become world-famous as a plant breeder, was in Dawson two years ago. He says that Alaska and the Yukon will some day be among the chief potato lands of the world and that by proper plant breeding a potato can be evolved that will mature here to perfection.

Our farms are your garden

No matter where you live. Even though you live in the hot, stuffy, crowded city, you have all the advantage of our fresh green fields and fertile gardens when it comes to

Campbell's Vegetable Soup

And even though you have a farm of your own you can obtain nothing better. No better vegetables can be raised than we use in this tempting soup. And we prepare them as carefully and delicately as it could be done in your own kitchen.

The larger vegetables — such as white potatoes, sweet potatoes, carrots and yellow turnips — we cut into attractive little "dice."

We include tender corn, juicy okra, tomatoes, barley, "baby" lima beans and the popular macaroni "alphabets." We add celery and parsley, of course, for flavor; also the slightest touch of sweet red peppers.

We combine all these appetizing materials with a rich stock made from selected beef. And the whole combination is as strengthening and nutritious as it is delightful. Wouldn't your family enjoy it today?

Hudson Super-Six Sets New 24-Hour Endurance Mark

Fastest Time for Such Distance ever made by a Traveling Machine

No man today—if he knows the facts—doubts the Super-Six supremacy.

At first the truth seemed like a romance. Think of one new invention, applied to a light six, adding 80 per cent. to its power.

Then official records began to pile up, certified by the A. A. A. The whole motoring world then had to concede this the greatest motor built.

But many men asked, "What about the endurance? Can a motor so flexible, so speedy, so powerful, stand up in years of road use?"

So we asked Ralph Mulford to take a stock Super-Six chassis and, under official supervision, show the world its endurance.

All Records Broken

He took a Super-Six stock chassis—certified by A. A. A. officials.

It had already been driven over 2000 miles at speed exceeding 80 miles per hour.

It had made a mile at Daytona at the rate of 102.53 miles per hour.

And he drove that car 1819 miles, on Sheepshead Bay track, equal to the distance from New York to Denver—in 24 hours of continuous driving—at an average speed of 75.8 miles per hour. At the end of that test—after nearly 4,000 miles of record-breaking strain—the car, when officially examined, showed no appreciable wear.

Greatest Endurance Proved

That was the last question—this one of endurance. In all other ways it has long been evident that the Super-Six stands supreme. Never has a motor of this size shown anywhere near such power. Never was an engine made to match this in smoothness. Never has a stock car recorded equal performance—in hill-climbing, quick acceleration or speed.

You are getting the car of the day when you get the Super-Six. Every man who knows the facts knows that. And, in view of our patents, rivalry is impossible.

But not one fact about the Super-Six is left unproved today. Not in one respect has its performance been matched. Not in any way has a rival motor been made to compare with this.

Thousands of these cars are now running. You will find them in every locality. And every owner will tell you that he never meets a car to compare with his, in looks or performance.

Other Unrivaled Records

All made under A. A. A. supervision, by a certified stock car or stock chassis, and excelling all former stock cars in these tests.

100 miles in 80 min., 21.4 sec., averaging 74.67 miles per hour for a 7-passenger touring car with driver and passenger.

75.69 miles in one hour with driver and passenger in a 7-passenger touring car.

Standing start to 50 miles an hour in 16.2 sec.

One mile at the rate of 102.53 miles per hour.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

Be not afraid, but speak and hold not thy peace. Acts 18 : 9

The Lord loves to speak to us in the night. When the house is still, and the fever of the day is over, when the clock ticks louder and the stars shine from deep spaces in the midnight sky, when the soul is hushed, then the Lord speaks. Yes, and when the sun of our life has set, or our soul is lonely and sad, or when the hatred of evil men like a dense cloud obscures the light of life, you may be sure that the Lord will draw near, saying: "Fear not." He not only speaks, but he is with us. He shares the loneliness, he steps beside us, we feel the pressure of his hand on ours. He encompasses our path and our lying down, besets us with loving kindness and tender mercy, and lays his hand upon us. If all the world attempt silence you, and Christ bids you s speak. If they will not listen, you hav option save to speak. A Little Church in a Big City

By Arthur H. Howland

THE eighteenth chapter of Acts is one of the most interesting in the entire book. Other chapters may be characterized as more important, but for sheer interest it would be hard to surpass this chapter, except, perhaps, by some of the later accounts of Paul's long voyage and shipwreck.

Notice the persons named in this chapter: Paul, the preacher, scholar, evangelist and tent-maker; Aquila, a Jewish Christian tent-maker, probably somewhat prosperous; Priscilla, his wife, a spiritually-minded and gifted Christian; Silas and Timothy, fellow workers with Paul; Justus, a Gentile householder, who lived next door to the Jewish synagogue; Crispus, the leading official of the Jewish congregation; Gallio, governor of Achaia, who was a brother of Seneca, the great Roman philosopher and poet (Gallio was of so cheerful and kindly a nature that he is referred to in Roman literature as "the pleasant Gallio"; Sosthenes, chief official of the synagogue, doubtless the successor of Crispus; Apollos, a scholarly Jew of Alexandria, who knew about Jesus and taught his doctrine, but who was led to a deeper and richer Christian experience by his friends Aquila and Priscilla.

Yet after all, the thing that makes this chapter particularly interesting is not so much the people as the place. Corinth was a city of furious excitement, furious activity and furious sin. Soldiers, sailors, merchants, slaves, philosophers, Jews, Phœnicians, Greeks, Romans—the population of Corinth, 400,000 in number, lived a restless, passionate life. Not only was the city almost surrendered to vice, but its vice had been made an integral part of its religion. It is hard enough to keep people from being vicious, even when they know that vice is sinful; but when they are taught that vice is holy, the difficulty is infinitely increased. The Jews had preached their purer morality, but with their conservative and exclusive traditions could make little headway against the torrents of vice. Now comes Paul, the dauntless Christian, the fire-touched prophet, the profound scholar, the busy tent-maker, the thoroughgoing man, and sets his faith, his philosophy, his code of morals, against the tides of idolatry, superstition, greed and vice of the monstrous city.

Corinth has risen and fallen many times since the days of Paul's preaching. He founded the strong church there to whose members he wrote two of his most important letters. One of the chapters of the first of these tells of something that shall abide after all the cities of the world have come to an end. "Love never faileth," he wrote. The power of love that was in his soul won Christians in the wicked city, made a church, which throughout many centuries helped to stem the tide of the surrounding evil. For one or two centuries in the Middle Ages, Turkey possessed Corinth; for a few years it was under the control of Venice. destroyed at the beginning of th teenth century in the Greek tion; was rebuilt; was wrecked a an earthquake in 1853. Some New Testament contend that he also wrote the to the Galatians at this time.

But matters did not go smoo the time. The Jews would not alone, but made an attack up and brought him into court. accused him of introducing an u form of worship. Yet Aquila and Priscilla, as they heard him speak, realized that something was lacking in his religious experience. Apollos had not yet received his Pentecost. Here was the case of a young preacher being taught by two of his congregation who had gone beyond him in the heavenly way. Apollos with all his fervor and culture did not resent this offer of Aquila and Priscilla to lead him to a higher plane of Christian living, a new vision of Christian truth, a new power for Christian work. "They expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly." With this new equipment, he felt a new zeal for missionary work, and went over to Achaia to help on the Christian propaganda there. The Ephesian Christians gave him letters of recommendation, and because of his bright new experience, he helped greatly the churches he visited. He not only strengthened the believers, but "mightily convinced" the Jews of the Messiahship of Jesus.
